Verwoerd's killing. It makes clear that Tsafendas's ultimate objective was the destruction of apartheid, with the assassination of Dr. Verwoerd, if that should be necessary, an assist to that end. This is entirely compatible with what Tsafendas told the police when questioned about his motive (that he was "disgusted" with apartheid and hoped that "a change of policy would take place" after the killing⁶²³⁰) and it was what more than a hundred of witnesses said to the police, to the Commission and to the author. However, it was totally incompatible with the scene in court, where Tsafendas was presented as a man without any political interests, who in fact supported the Government, and who killed Dr. Verwoerd because of a tapeworm he believed lived inside him. Furness's statement could also have been used by the Commission when discussing Tsafendas's motive for killing Dr. Verwoerd, but again it is omitted.

A significant omission is Tsafendas's personal relationships in England. The Report says "Tsafendas was noticed in the company of leftists," but it does not give any names. However, it was known to the Commission that Tsafendas associated while in London with Commander Thomas Fox-Pitt, the secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society and one of the leading figures in the modern anti-slavery movement who had characterised Tsafendas as "very simple-minded and not at all sinister."⁶²³¹ It was also known that he had met and associated with prominent anti-apartheid activists such as David Gardener,⁶²³² the Rev. Canon John Collins and Solly Sachs.⁶²³³

Furness, who testified both to the police and to the Commission, told the police that Tsafendas was "a regular visitor" to the offices of the anti-apartheid movement and that he had seen him "in company of several members of the party, including David Gardener" and that it was "beyond doubt that he associated" with the movement and its members.⁶²³⁴ He also told the police that an "African" man named "Tennison" was there regularly and often gave speeches.⁶²³⁵ Although the police were given only the first name of this "African," it should not have been difficult to deduce that the man was the ANC representative in London, Tennyson Xola Makiwane. He was, after all, a Black African and a prominent activist

⁶²³⁰ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶²³¹ The Guardian, 30 September 1966: 10, 'Winding back.'

⁶²³² Edward Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966, K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶²³³ Robert Harpur Smith statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²³⁴ Edward Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966, K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶²³⁵ Edward Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966, K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

associated with the British anti-apartheid movement.

When the name of Rowley Arenstein, the South African Communist lawyer and anti-apartheid activist, was mentioned by two witnesses during the investigation, the police and the Commission made inquiries about a possible connection, questioning Arenstein, his secretary and Tsafendas himself. It would seem obvious that Tsafendas would be asked about any links in London to prominent anti-apartheid activists. The Commission refers to Tsafendas's response to questions about Arenstein, first that he did not know him, then when faced with the witnesses' statements, that he had only a casual business acquaintanceship with him. The Commission's Report clearly suggests that there was no real connection between Tsafendas and Arenstein (this incident will be discussed later in this chapter). However, what is surprising is that it makes no reference to any of the London activists mentioned above or whether Tsafendas was asked to explain his knowledge of or relationship to any of them. It seems that the Commission did not find it necessary to find out, or, having found out, did not wish to make Tsafendas's anti-apartheid links public knowledge.

What suggests that Tsafendas must indeed have been asked about the London activists is that the Commission went to great lengths to find out about Tsafendas's relationship with people such as John Michaletos (discussed later in this chapter), who were far less important to the apartheid authorities than Sachs, Makiwane and Rev. Collins. Furthermore, the Commission appeared to have examined even the most far-fetched rumours about Tsafendas and his connections, even that he had murdered and raped women all over the world; since it specifically mentions these rumours in its Report (Chapter II B, Paragraph 43).

The absence of the London names is of particular interest in the case of Tennyson Makiwane. Tsafendas was very proud of his association with the anti-apartheid movement in London and his participation in demonstrations and meetings, and he talked widely, about his activities, especially his association with Makiwane. Witnesses who heard him talk of these matters included Fathers Minas Constandinou and Nikola Banovic, Mary Eendracht, Fotini Gavasiadis, Katerina Pnefma, Patrick O'Ryan and Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis. As Tsafendas explained it, he did not have any personal relationships with the activists, they were not bosom friends; he had simply met them at anti-apartheid meetings and had volunteered his services as a helper. His association with them was basically running errands and helping out with small jobs required in any organized movement. The fact that Makiwane and Sachs are mentioned by different witnesses confirms Tsafendas's claims, and when Tsafendas returned to South Africa in 1963, his bags contained a large quantity of anti-apartheid literature. He told witnesses that it was given to him by members of the British anti-apartheid movement, though he did not mention any names.⁶²³⁶

Furness's statement to the Commission was not found in the archives, therefore we cannot know what he said and whether he gave additional information about Tsafendas's activities in London. However, Tsafendas subsequently told Father Minas Constandinou that he was surprised that the police knew so much about what he did at this time and place.⁶²³⁷ It is interesting that in his statement to the police, Tsafendas volunteers information about some of his activities in London, while omitting reference to his political activism elsewhere, for example his 1965 arrest in Beira or his participation in the Greek Civil War. This would clearly suggest that he was specifically asked about his activities during his time in London.

Finally, the Commission has used the English language in such a way as to raise doubts regarding the veracity of Tsafendas's statements. It may not be obvious to non-native English speakers, but the expression "According to Tsafendas ..." suggests that it was only Tsafendas who mentioned his activities. That could imply that there was doubt as to the veracity of his statement because he alone was quoted. However, the Commission knew his claims were true because Furness had confirmed them in his statement. The phraseology used by the Commission seemed intended to cast doubt on the truth of Tsafendas's comments. The inescapable conclusion is that the Commission either considered Tsafendas's association with leading members of the anti-apartheid and anti-slavery movements in London to be unimportant, or it suppressed the information in order not to link Tsafendas in any way with the ANC and such well-known activists.

TSAFENDAS'S IMPRISONMENT IN PORTUGAL IN 1949

*Apparently the Portuguese authorities would not accept Tsafendas's refugee passport, nor his claim that he was a Portuguese subject, the result being that he was arrested at the border post Barca d'Alva on 8th February, 1949. It appears that he was afterwards detained for a long time.*⁶²³⁸

The Commission deals with Tsafendas's arrests and imprisonments in Portugal in fewer than fifty words which contain one blatant inaccuracy and lack any semblance of factual detail. As such, the Commission seriously underplays the significance of these events.

⁶²³⁶ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶²³⁷ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶²³⁸ Chapter II B, Paragraph 17.

Tsafendas was indeed arrested at Barca d'Alva but the date was November 8, 1949, not February 8, 1949. He was detained because of doubts about his passport and his claim to Portuguese citizenship. The passport in fact was valid and the Lourenço Marques authorities informed the Portuguese police that Tsafendas was indeed a Portuguese citizen. However, they added that he had been dismissed from a job for "voicing Communist ideas" and that he was suspected of "spreading Communist propaganda" although "nothing was proven."⁶²³⁹ It was because of these two incidents, not the passport, that Tsafendas was detained and interrogated. While he arrested on the passport issue, he was subsequently detained for a lengthy period because of the two incidents.

As for the Commission's vague reference to "a long time in detention," Tsafendas was held at Barca d'Alva for three months, then transferred to the Aljuba Prison for political prisoners in Lisbon, where he remained for several more months.⁶²⁴⁰ The Commission was aware of the reasons for Tsafendas's lengthy detention, but omitted them whilst implying that he was held over a passport problem.

TSAFENDAS'S IMPRISONMENT IN PORTUGAL IN 1952

A more important omission by the Commission, one that was left out altogether, concerned a further term of imprisonment in Portugal. After being denied entry to Mozambique in 1951 and informed that he was now banned from the country, Tsafendas was sent back to Portugal. Upon his return to Lisbon in January 1952, he was detained for the usual reasons - his 1930s Communist and anti-Portuguese activities in Mozambique.⁶²⁴¹ This time he was held in the notorious Cascais (Caxias) Fort.⁶²⁴² That establishment and Aljuba were the two facilities set ⁶²³⁹ PIDE Confidential Report about Demitrio Tsafendas, 7 June 1955. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Confidential Report of the Police Body of the Province of Mozambique regarding Demetrio Tsafendas. No: 726/694/PI, 3 May 1955. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Secret Criminal Record n° 10.415 of Demitrios Tsafantakis. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Confidential Report of the Police Body of the Province of Mozambique regarding Demetrio Tsafendas. No: 726/694/PI, 3 May 1955. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁴⁰ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT

⁶²⁴¹ Confidential Letter of the Director of PIDE to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no: 2.077- S.R., 3 May 1961. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Diario Popular, 9 September 1966, 'E conhesido em Lisboa o assassino do Dr. Verwoerd.'

⁶²⁴² PIDE Report regarding Tsafendas, 5 May 1956. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Diario Popular, 9 September 1966, 'E conhesido em Lisboa o assassino do Dr. Verwoerd.'

aside for political prisoners. Both were effectively run by the PIDE.⁶²⁴³

Historically, military courts dealt with suspicions of political dissent. Later, this responsibility was handed to the PIDE, whose officers decided who should be arrested -- in practice all those who opposed or might oppose the government -- and how long they should serve. By the time Tsafendas was arrested, many hundreds of political prisoners filled these two gaols and reports were widespread of ill-treatment, including beatings, cigarette burns, tiny damp cells, and permanent darkness. These and more systematic tortures were reported in 1962 by an Amnesty International investigation that confirmed appalling conditions in both prisons.⁶²⁴⁴

Tsafendas himself was tortured in Cascais Fort by the administration of electric shocks aimed at discovering if he supported any active movements for the independence of Mozambique.⁶²⁴⁵ Although he was a political prisoner for almost a year in 1949 and another year in 1952, the Commission omitted this information from its Report. This was despite the fact that Judge van Wyk was well aware of them from PIDE's report, Tsafendas's own statement and Hartford's interview, all of which mentioned both arrests.

Also missing from the Commission's Report are the names of the two prisons, evidently because questions would be asked as to why a person held on a travel issue should be incarcerated in a prison for political offenders. It seems inescapable that the Commission's omissions regarding Tsafendas's second arrest and his incarceration in political prisons were intended to conceal the real extent of Tsafendas's political engagement.

TSAFENDAS'S ARREST IN MOZAMBIQUE IN 1964

On 16th November, 1964, Tsafendas was arrested by the Portuguese Security Police for making subversive statements. These statements show strong feelings against Portugal. On this occasion, according to his statement to the Police, he was under the influence of liquor. During his detention he read books written in Bantu languages, but never the Bible. On 26th

⁶²⁴³ Vincent (The Spectator), 12 April 1962: 11, 'The shame of Portugal.' Available at <http://archive.spectator.co.uk/article/13th-april-1962/11/the-shame-of-portugal>

⁶²⁴⁴ Vincent (The Spectator), 12 April 1962: 11, 'The shame of Portugal.' Available at <http://archive.spectator.co.uk/article/13th-april-1962/11/the-shame-of-portugal>

⁶²⁴⁵ Patrick O' Ryan testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA; The Cape Argus, 7 September 1966: 3, 'Brainwashed in jail held man told Argus.'; Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

January, 1965, he was released.⁶²⁴⁶

All of the above information is correct. However, very little is vouchsafed about Tsafendas's conduct while his political activity is downgraded or omitted. Importantly, the Commission ignored another arrest, again for subversive propaganda, that took place only a few days after he was released. We will examine this case below.

The details of Tsafendas's November 16 arrest and imprisonment on serious charges, are not given in the Report, which appears to treat the incident as some sort of alcoholic peccadillo. The political ideas and statements Tsafendas made to the police are nowhere to be seen, although they were known to the Commission. In reality, Tsafendas was arrested in Maforga, a small town five miles from Gondola, on November 16, 1964, by the Portuguese Public Security Police, accused of "making subversive propaganda against the Portuguese government and spreading subversive propaganda among the native masses." He was taken to a police sub-station in Beira for interrogation.⁶²⁴⁷ This was known to the Commission.

When the police discovered that his suitcase contained books that were anti-apartheid, anti-colonialist and pro-Communist, as well as several Bibles, he was accused of pretending to be a missionary spreading Christianity, while actually preaching "under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique's independence..."⁶²⁴⁸ Due to the seriousness of the charges, he was handed over to the Sub-Delegation of PIDE in Beira.⁶²⁴⁹ There, he was interrogated by PIDE's Sub-Inspector, Joaquim Piçara Sabino, Brigade Chief Augusto de Sousa Maia, and agent Virgílio Francisco.⁶²⁵⁰

While in custody, Tsafendas was asked by the police if he had "dedicated himself to preach as a missionary and, under the guise of this same religion, advertised in favour of Mozambique's independence." Tsafendas replied that he was "a Christian who considers himself a representative of God on earth, a missionary that wishes he could preach the ⁶²⁴⁶ Chapter III C, Paragraph 19.

⁶²⁴⁷ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁴⁸ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Costas Poriazis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

⁶²⁴⁹ PIDE report about the Defendant: Demitrio Tsafendas or Dimitrius Tsafendakis. 19 January 1965. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; PIDE report regarding Demitrio Tsafendas or Dimitrius Tsafendakis, 19 January 1965. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas

⁶²⁵⁰ PIDE Record of questions. 25 November 1964. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

Christian religion but that he is not allowed to because, on this earth, there is no freedom of expression.” He maintained, however, that he strongly supported the independence of Mozambique, but was not a member of any subversive group.⁶²⁵¹ The information concerning his religious activities and non-subversive support for Mozambican independence support was probably not known to the Commission since PIDE omitted it from the report they gave to the South African police.

Even so, the Commission was certainly in possession of a statement by Inspector Horacio Ferreira, the officer in charge of the police cells where Tsafendas was kept for some fourteen days after his arrest. This statement was found in the Commission's archives in NASA and used in the Report for its reference to Tsafendas reading books in Bantu languages. It was Inspector Ferreira who stated that during his detention, Tsafendas was often seen to read books written in “Bantu languages, but never the Bible.” However, Inspector Ferreira's statement provided information of much greater importance than Tsafendas's choice of reading matter, information which the Commission chose to ignore. Ferreira characterised Tsafendas as “intense anti-white” and someone convinced that “the Portuguese Government has never done anything for its non-whites.” He also said he considered Tsafendas to be “normal” and “a very intelligent person.”⁶²⁵² Although Inspector Ferreira was able to observe Tsafendas in detention for fourteen days, the Commission used the least significant of his observations; that is what Tsafendas read while in custody. That he was characterised as “intense anti-white,” “anti-Portuguese” and “a very intelligent person” are omitted.

As for the reference to liquor, the PIDE report held by the Commission said that Tsafendas had confessed to making anti-Portuguese statements but added that “he was under the influence of liquor and also under exultations (excitement).” However, according to the PIDE report, Tsafendas also made it clear to his interrogators that “these words were caused by the ideas which he had about the independence of Mozambique, a Mozambique governed by natives whether white or black, but separate from the mother-country.” The PIDE reported concluded that “although, as above mentioned, Tsafendas is mentally disabled, the truth is you find in him a true spirit of rebellion against the ruling institutions, and a clear adhesion to the independence of Mozambique.”⁶²⁵³

⁶²⁵¹ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁵² South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, File 1/5. FILE Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

None of the above is mentioned in the Commission's Report, although it was all set out in the PIDE report to the South African police which was in the Commission's possession. Tsafendas's political convictions, especially his support for the independence of Mozambique, are all omitted, while his anti-Portuguese stance is attributed to liquor. Although Tsafendas had made it clear that these words were his ideas, despite the fact that he had been drinking, the Commission conveniently omitted Tsafendas's whole statement and included the comment about the liquor, thus giving a completely different picture of the incident and of Tsafendas.

It is no surprise, therefore, that Tsafendas's most “dangerous” political statement, his carefully considered prescription for a future Mozambique as an independent country “governed by natives whether white or black, but separate from the mother-country,” does not see the light of day. In summary, Tsafendas's political activities and convictions, most importantly his support for an independent Mozambique and his efforts to raise awareness for this cause, are downgraded, omitted or offhandedly attributed to alcohol and thus of little consequence.

TSAFENDAS'S SECOND ARREST BY THE PORTUGUESE SECURITY POLICE IN MOZAMBIQUE

Tsafendas's arrest and imprisonment in Lisbon in 1952 is not the only one omitted from the Report. Soon after his release in January 1965, in the incident discussed just above, Tsafendas was arrested again by the Portuguese police in Mozambique and this arrest is not to be found in the Commission's Report. Newspapers worldwide such as the British Daily Mirror and The Daily News, The Herald of Melbourne, Australia, the Rhodesia Herald and the Herald African News Service, as well as The Star in South Africa, plus many others reported clearly that Tsafendas was twice arrested, detained and questioned about “suspicious activities” while in Mozambique, and not just once as stated by the Commission in its Report.⁶²⁵⁴ The Dagbreek had referred to three arrests and had even reported that Tsafendas ⁶²⁵³ Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁵⁴ The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, ‘Tsafendas seen as ‘mystery man’; The Herald (Melbourne), 8 September 1966: 1, ‘The killer: Five passports and a record of subversion’; The Rhodesia Herald, 8 September had “clashed with the law in the USA and Mozambique, and especially his activities in Mozambique left a huge question mark over and around his name.”⁶²⁵⁵ According to these Press reports, the second arrest, which the Report omitted, was Tsafendas being arrested in Beira “after being seen in cafes with Coloured political suspects.”⁶²⁵⁶

Press reports aside, the South African embassy in Lisbon, on September 7, the day after the assassination, informed the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Cape Town that Tsafendas “has a criminal record in Mozambique, where he is said to have been arrested on several occasions after creating public disturbances, including shouting pro-Communist anti-Portuguese slogans.” It went on to say “if information correct, we suspect Portuguese may play down assassin’s previous political activities and we would suggest full details in this connection be sought.”⁶²⁵⁷ However, the Commission mentions only one arrest in Mozambique, the one in November 16, 1964.

Shortly after his release from PIDE custody on January 26, Tsafendas found a job as an interpreter at the docks in Beira. However, he was dismissed after attempting to organise a strike. The dock owner did not report the incident to the police because he was a friend of Tsafendas’s brother-in-law, Gerry Pnema, and did not want to cause him trouble.⁶²⁵⁸ A few days later, Tsafendas was in a bar with several Mozambicans and Greeks, among them Andreas Babiolakis, Costas Poriadis and Nick Papadakis. At one point, Tsafendas bought beer for everyone, then paraphrasing Mark Anthony in Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar, happily called out, “Friends, countrymen, lend me your glasses.” However, when he called on them to drink to a recent attack by FRELIMO rebels, everyone froze and lowered their glasses untouched while Tsafendas downed his beer. The bar owner politely asked Tsafendas to leave and he never returned.⁶²⁵⁹

The next day, Tsafendas was arrested by the Portuguese police because of his comments at the bar and his activities at the docks which the police had learned about by then. However, he was released almost immediately because the police had by now accepted

1966: 1, ‘Assassin said to have been deported from P.E.A. for Communist connections.’ The Star, 10 September 1966: 3, ‘Assassin had five passports.’

⁶²⁵⁵ Dagbreek, 11 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas het vir V.V. in Persie gewerk.’

⁶²⁵⁶ Daily Mirror, 9 September 1966: 11, ‘The clouded past of an assassin.’

⁶²⁵⁷ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Lisbon, to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 07 September 1966. K150, Vol. 7, File: 09/04 Suspect Persons Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶²⁵⁸ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶²⁵⁹ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Costas Poriadis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

that he was “mentally ill and therefore not chargeable at a juridical or penal level” and there was no point in detaining him any longer.⁶²⁶⁰

It is likely that the Commission was unaware of the details of this arrest. However, since two arrests were reported widely by the South African media, the Commission might have been expected to make inquiries, as it did with other, less important and far-fetched, stories about Tsafendas. The second arrest was well-known within the Greek Community in Beira and Gondola, and Tsafendas gave evidence twice to the Commission and could have answered questions about the issue.

TSAFENDAS'S ARREST AND IMPRISONMENT IN MOZAMBIQUE IN 1951

*In October, 1951, Tsafendas left Portugal for Lourenço Marques where he was not allowed to land, the result being that he was forced to return to Portugal in January, 1952.*⁶²⁶¹

The Commission here omits the reason Tsafendas was “not allowed to land” in Mozambique – that he was listed as Communist and suspected of involvement in subversive activities. PIDE had withheld this information from the reports it gave to the South African police, but Antony Maw, Greece's honorary Consul in Lourenço Marques, revealed to the South African police that the refusal was due to Tsafendas's “suspected Communist tendencies.”⁶²⁶²

Furthermore, Tsafendas deportation was published in the South African Press, with at least three newspapers, The Daily News, the Pretoria News and The Star reporting that Tsafendas was deported from Mozambique because of “Communist activities.”⁶²⁶³ Also absent is Tsafendas's arrest in Lourenço Marques following a refusal to be “allowed to land,” and his subsequent two weeks' imprisonment when he was interrogated by the Portuguese police regarding his past “unclear activities.”⁶²⁶⁴ This information was also omitted by PIDE and not reported by the South African Press of the time.

⁶²⁶⁰ Andreas Babioulakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Costas Poriazis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

⁶²⁶¹ Chapter II B, Paragraph 23.

⁶²⁶² Antony Maw statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol 4, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

⁶²⁶³ The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, ‘Tsafendas seen as ‘mystery man’; Pretoria News, 7 September 1966: 1, ‘Dimitrio a Red, they alleged’; The Star, 10 September 1966: 3, ‘Assassin had five passports.’

⁶²⁶⁴ PIDE Record of questions. 25 November 1964. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; PIDE Confidential Report about Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; John Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

Yet another omission is Tsafendas's extraordinary appendicitis deception. When he learned that he would not be allowed off the ship that had taken him to Lourenço Marques, Tsafendas doubled up dramatically, pretending to be in terrible pain from appendicitis. He was rushed to a hospital ashore, from which he calmly walked out, but was apprehended sometime later. The appendicitis trick spread through the entire Greek community in Lourenço Marques, although none of those questioned mentioned it to the police. Antony Maw, in his statement to the police, said only that Tsafendas had "claimed illness,"⁶²⁶⁵ without specifying it, though he was well aware of the appendicitis act.⁶²⁶⁶

TSAFENDAS'S EXILE

The Commission's Report makes no reference at all to the fact that Tsafendas was banned from entering and residing in Mozambique, the country of his birth, and was forced to live in exile from 1951 to 1963.⁶²⁶⁷ Nor is there mention of the fact that he had made at least six applications to be allowed to return in Mozambique since 1939 and all were turned down. PIDE had removed this information from the reports they gave to the South African police, presumably because they would have had to include the reasons for the banning, which were Tsafendas's Communist and anti-colonialist ideas and activities. PIDE's omission was compatible with its director's order to withhold from the South African police "any information indicating Tsafendas as a partisan for the independence of Mozambique."⁶²⁶⁸

However, Tsafendas had spoken about his exile when interrogated by the South African police, stating that in August or September, 1963, he "received amnesty" in order to be allowed to return to Mozambique.⁶²⁶⁹ One receives amnesty to return to a country only after being banned from residing there. The issue of the amnesty will be discussed again shortly. Furthermore, the fact that he was forced to live in exile was published not only in the South African Press, but worldwide.⁶²⁷⁰ Therefore, the Commission was aware of it but chose ⁶²⁶⁵ Antony Maw statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub File: 1/8. NASA.

⁶²⁶⁶ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶²⁶⁷ Confidential Letter of the Director of PIDE to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, no: 2.077- S.R., 03 May 1961. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Letter of a police agent to the Ministry of Interiors regarding Tsafendas's exile. 30 October 1962. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁶⁸ Top Secret letter of the head Inspector of PIDE in Lisbon to the Subdirector of PIDE in Mozambique regarding Demetrio Tsafendas, 8 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁶⁹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶²⁷⁰ The Chronicle, 8 September 1966: 1, 'Tsafendas: Mystery man of parliament'; The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, 'Tsafendas seen as 'mystery man''; The Herald, 8 September 1966: 1, 'The killer'; to omit it, either because it felt that Tsafendas being exiled from Mozambique for his Communist and anti-colonial activities was not worth mentioning or it wished to downplay the extent of Tsafendas's political activism.

TSAFENDAS'S AMNESTY IN 1963

*In 1963 he left Portugal for Lourenço Marques where he stayed with an uncle for a short time.*⁶²⁷¹

This single sentence makes no mention of the fact that Tsafendas was given an amnesty by the Portuguese Government and that is why he was allowed to return to Mozambique. That Tsafendas had received an amnesty by the Portuguese Government was known to the South African police as he had told them so when he was interrogated on the 11th of September: "In August or September, 1963, I received amnesty and the Social Services agreed to pay my boat fare to Lourenço Marques. I left immediately on the Princippi Porfeeto and arrived in L.M. during approximately October, 1963."⁶²⁷²

Paragraph 41 provides an obvious opportunity for the Commission to report the amnesty, but it fails to do so. The reason seems obvious: if the Commission had mentioned that Tsafendas received amnesty from the Portuguese Government, the question would have been, "Why did he need an amnesty to return to the country in which he was born and of which he was a citizen?" Amnesties were for people who had been convicted of an offence, so the next question would have been, "what had Tsafendas done?"

It is just possible that the Commission considered the amnesty question not important enough to include in its Report. It is much more likely that the Commission deliberately suppressed the information as it would have demonstrated that Tsafendas was more politically active than was known at the time, which was why he was in exile from Mozambique for all those years. This would be just one omission, a minor one in comparison to the others, by the Commission regarding Tsafendas's political activities and involvement.

Pretoria News, 7 September 1966: 1, 'Dimitrio a Red, they alleged'; The Rhodesia Herald, 8 September 1966: 1, 'Assassin said to have been deported from P.E.A. for Communist connections.'; The Star, 10 September 1966: 3, 'Assassin had five passports.'

⁶²⁷¹ Chapter II B, Paragraph 41.

⁶²⁷² Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

TSAFENDAS IN GREECE (Chapter II B, Paragraphs 11-15) AND HIS PARTICIPATION IN THE CIVIL WAR

All the evidence regarding Tsafendas's participation in this war is presented in Chapter Two of this study. To describe Tsafendas's movements while in Greece, the Commission uses mostly information taken from his September 11 statement to the South African police. The fact that he had joined the Democratic Army of Greece (DSE), the military wing of the Greek Communist Party, during the Greek Civil War is omitted. At least seven witnesses, Cleanthes Alachiotis, Nikolaos Billis, Elias Constantaras, Nikolas Kambouris, Giorgos Kantas, Grigoris Pouftis and Michalis Vasilakis, had testified to the South African police that Tsafendas told them he had joined the DSE during the Civil War. His participation in the war was also known to some of his close friends, like Babiolakis, Papadakis, Poriadis and Kyriakakis, although they had not testified to the police. Some relatives, including Katerina Pnema and Mary Eendracht, were also aware of it, but had not reported it to the police.

A statement by the Eleni seaman, Nicolas Mavronas that was found in the NASA, says Tsafendas told the crew that "he joined the Greek army during the war and that he is an expert shot."⁶²⁷³ The army Mavronas referred to was the DSE, and the war was the Civil War, the most recent war in Greece. The South African policeman who took Mavronas' statement did not specify the war Tsafendas talked about and seemed to assume it was the Second World War. Six seamen who participated in the Eleni conversation and were interviewed by the South African Police and by the author said they clearly remembered Tsafendas saying he served with the Allied Navy during the Second World War and with the DSE during the Greek Civil War. They were positive that Tsafendas never said he joined the Greek regular army. None of them doubted him because it was clear that he knew about the DSE and how it was organized and operated.⁶²⁷⁴ The Commission was in possession of Mavronas' statement, but it made no mention of what he said regarding Tsafendas joining the Greek Army and being an expert shot. Ignoring this important information, it went instead into great detail about some far-fetched rumours and information concerning Tsafendas and how it investigated them and found them to be untrue.

⁶²⁷³ Nicolas Mavronas statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol 3, File Die 'Eleni.' NASA.

⁶²⁷⁴ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

More rumours were contained in a report submitted to the Commission by the Die Landstem newspaper. The Commission examined some of these rumours and declared them to be untrue. However, the telegram also contained some correct references to Tsafendas, for example how he left South Africa by sea during the Second World War and the dates of his entry to some of the countries to which he travelled. The Commission refers to this telegram in Chapter II B, Paragraph 43, where a whole section deals with rumours about Tsafendas:

“At a relatively late stage, the Commission received information from a weekly newspaper that there were rumours that Tsafendas had fled from South Africa, because he was wanted by the police for attempted murder, that he had committed a murder in Mozambique, that he had raped and seriously assaulted a woman in Montreal, that he had raped and assaulted a White Woman in Ontario, that he had blown up a ship with dynamite in Boston, that in New York he was found on his way to the docks with explosives, that in Greece he was suspected of murders and rapes, that in Portugal he had strangled and raped a young girl, that in Germany he was suspected of murders. Tsafendas denies all these allegations. From the information at the Commission's disposal, it appears unlikely that the allegations concerning the reason for his departure from South Africa in 1942 have any foundation. The same applies to the alleged crimes in Canada, the United States of America, Portugal and Mozambique. No evidence of any other alleged crimes came to the knowledge of the Commission. As yet no reply has been received to some of the enquiries that were made, and should any information worthy of mention come to hand after the submission of this report, it will be given in a supplementary report.”

However, Die Landstem's telegram also contained the following information:

*“In 1947 he was sent to Greece which was in a bad state after WWII. There was general hunger, food shortages and unemployment among the Greek people. Tsafendas wandered around starving and without shelter until he joined the Greek Communist Party with whom he fought against the Greek Government.”*⁶²⁷⁵

While taking pains to set out a series of wild rumours, and then discount them, the Commission failed to mention Tsafendas's participation with the Communists in the Greek Civil War. This must have sounded far more real than all the other material since Tsafendas had admitted to the South African police and to the Commission that he was a member of the ⁶²⁷⁵ Die Landstem telegram. n.d. K150, Vol 5. NASA.

SACP in the late 1930s and early 1940s. More importantly, Tsafendas was indeed in Greece during the Civil War. Even if the Commission had previously been unaware of this fact, it was no aware of the fact and could have researched the matter further.

It seems possible that the Commission dismissed Mavronas' statement in the belief that it was inaccurate since Tsafendas was known not to be in Greece during the Second World War, the war the Commission wrongly assumed Mavronas was referring to. However, on other occasions when a witness gave inaccurate evidence to the Commission, Judge van Wyk pointed it out. For example, in Chapter II B, Paragraph 41, the Report says:

"In 1963 he left Portugal for Lourenço Marques where he stayed with an uncle for a short time. One witness alleged that he saw Tsafendas in Zambia during June, as well as in various other months in 1963. Tsafendas denies that he ever visited that country, and says that he did not leave Portugal until August or September, 1963."

The author is not in position to know whether the missing statements from the Eleni crew were suppressed by the Commission or whether they were never given to it. The fact that they were not found in the NASA does not necessarily mean that they were not given to the Commission, since almost seventy statements taken by the Commission itself have now gone missing and clearly these statements were in the hands of the Commission at the time.

The Commission also attempted to locate John Michaletos, the man who recruited Tsafendas to the DSE in 1947. First, the South African police asked Costas Michaletos about John Michaletos, claiming that they had found a letter by him, sent from Greece, in Tsafendas's possession. It was known that Tsafendas corresponded with various people around the world and it is likely that the police found some of these letters at the time of his arrest. Therefore, why would the police ask about someone in Greece corresponding with him? It could have been the contents of the letter (which was not found in the archives), but it could also have been that Tsafendas told the police or the Commission during interrogation that he had joined the DSE during the Greek Civil War and that John Michaletos had recruited him. Costas Michaletos characterised John Michaletos to the South African police as an "active communist" in 1952. This suggests that he was also "active" during the Civil War which had ended only three years earlier. It also suggests that Costas Michaletos was possibly asked specifically about John Michaletos's political ideas.

Inquiries by the police and the Commission about John Michaletos did not stop after the approach to Costas Michaletos. Indeed, the authorities went to great lengths to find out more about this Communist Michaletos. Apparently they did not see him just as someone who just wrote letters to Tsafendas. On November 7, 1966, the Commission of Enquiry contacted the Portuguese Embassy in Pretoria "requesting any possible information regarding an individual named John Machletos from whom, allegedly, Demitrio Tsafendas, who claims to be a Portuguese citizen, would have received mail from abroad." The Commission's request was passed by the embassy to the Director General of PIDE in Lisbon.⁶²⁷⁶ On November 17, PIDE sent a letter to the Director-General for Political Affairs and Internal Administration in Lisbon stating that "there are no records of John Machletos in the registries of this Police."⁶²⁷⁷

The question is: Would the Commission have gone to these lengths about a simple letter-writer? Tsafendas corresponded regularly with people abroad, like Father Nikola Banovic in Istanbul and George Grispos in Rhodesia, and the Commission made no inquiries about them. That said, it cannot be ruled out that the South African authorities did not become aware of such information.

Since John Michaletos was a Greek and lived in Greece at the time, the first and most logical thing for the Commission to do would have been to contact the Greek authorities. However, it seems that, assuming they were contacted, the Greece authorities were unable to locate Michaletos and the Commission then turned to the Portuguese. The request, made on November 7, came two weeks after Tsafendas's summary trial, suggesting that contacts with the Greeks could have had taken up the intervening period. Given the Greek government's readiness to help the South African police, as already demonstrated by its co-operation over the Eleni, it would surely have been willing to help the South Africans with the Michaletos request, too. A possible explanation for the Greeks' failure to locate Michaletos is that his name was misspelled by the Commission. It appeared as Machletos in the Commission's request and also in the PIDE letter to the government in Lisbon, therefore it is very possible that it was also misspelled when it was given to the Greek authorities.

There are no records of any of the Commission's requests in the National Archives of South Africa. However, the Portuguese National Archives contain the Commission's request in PIDE's file on Tsafendas. There are no records of Tsafendas in the Greek National Archives and therefore it cannot be ascertained with certainty whether the Greek authorities were indeed contacted by the South Africans. Would the Commission have made enquiries to PIDE about a childhood friend who was just writing to Tsafendas? Although the Commission tried strenuously to locate this man, he is not mentioned in the Report.

⁶²⁷⁶ Confidential Letter of the Director-General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the Director of PIDE requesting information regarding John Machletos. 7 November 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁷⁷ Letter of the Director of PIDE to the Mr. Director-General for Political Affairs and Internal Administration regarding John Machletos. 16 November 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

TSAFENDAS BEING A COMMUNIST

Within twenty-four hours of Dr. Verwoerd's assassination, all of South Africa knew from the Press and radio that Tsafendas was a Communist who had been deported from Mozambique because of his Communist beliefs and activities.⁶²⁷⁸ Further reports in the ensuing days added details to the sketchy early dispatches.⁶²⁷⁹ Despite this, the word Communism was never heard during his summary trial. On 30th October, while the Commission was still at work, The Post newspaper revealed that Tsafendas had been a member of the SACP.⁶²⁸⁰

As with the public, it was the day after the assassination, 7th of September, that the South African authorities themselves learned of Tsafendas's adherence to Communism. On that day, the South African Embassy in Lisbon informed the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Cape Town that Tsafendas "has a criminal record in Mozambique, where he is said to have been arrested on several occasions after creating public disturbances, including shouting pro-Communist anti-Portuguese slogans ... if information correct, we suspect Portuguese may play down assassin's previous political activities and we would suggest full details in this connection be sought."⁶²⁸¹

As we have seen, the Portuguese did exactly what was said in this telegram, but the South African police made no great effort to discover more about these political activities. They appeared simply to accept what was given to them by the Portuguese. As for the Commission, although it included in its Report that Tsafendas was a Communist and a former ⁶²⁷⁸ Pretoria News, 7 September 1966: 1, 'Dimitrio a Red, they alleged.'

⁶²⁷⁹ Dagbreek, 11 September 1966, 'Tsafendas het vir V.V. in Persie gewerk.'; The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, 'Tsafendas seen as 'mystery man''; The Herald (Melbourne), 8 September 1966: 1, 'The killer: Five passports and a record of subversion'; The Rhodesia Herald, 8 September 1966: 1, 'Assassin said to have been deported from P.E.A. for Communist connections'; The Star, 10 September 1966: 3, 'Assassin had five passports.'

⁶²⁸⁰ The Post, 30 October 1966: 1, 'Tsafendas: I was a communist.'

⁶²⁸¹ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Lisbon, to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 07 September 1966. K150, Vol. 7, File: 09/04 Suspect Persons Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

member of the SACP, both already known and published facts, it soft-pedalled the extent and the significance of his political activities and involvement with Communism.

TSAFENDAS DESCRIBED AS A COMMUNIST BY WITNESSES WHO KNEW HIM

A number of Tsafendas's acquaintances and workmates testified that Tsafendas was a Communist; Vergos even describing him as "the biggest Communist in the Republic."⁶²⁸² However, only a few of these statements were included in the Report. A detailed account of Tsafendas's Communist activities and statements about his political ideology can be seen in his biography in Chapter Two. More statements can be seen in Chapter Four.

Durban Men's Home

*On 21st June, 1965, he moved into the Durban Men's Home, Durban, where he lived until 24th August, 1965. At this home he expressed himself strongly against the South African Government and in favour of Communism.*⁶²⁸³

This information is correct but again important aspects of the situation are omitted, including Tsafendas's own words. The police and the Commission interviewed two people from Durban's Home and the Report is based on their testimonies. This is what they said:

Robert Smith, the night clerk at Durban Men's Home, told the police that Tsafendas was a "Communist," "a fanatic on politics and seldom spoke of anything else" and had said that "the United Party and National Party officials and members were capitalistic roughs." Tsafendas had also told him that the "South African Government's policy was 'rotten' and often compared conditions in South Africa with those in Russia, stating, 'Look at all the poor people in South Africa, such conditions don't exist in Russia because Russia is a Communistic state.'" Smith also testified that Tsafendas had "a large quantity of literature" but he did not "know the nature thereof."⁶²⁸⁴

Kenneth Ross was the manager in Durban Men's Home. He testified that Tsafendas was "very fond of discussing politics and gave me the opinion that he was well versed in politics. Tsafendas objected to the Communists being banished to Robin-Island because of their political opinions and actions. In general, Tsafendas opposed to every decision taken by the South African Government and freely voiced his opinion to me. He was blatantly opposed to the National Party policy, the policy of the present Government, and was definitely pre-Russian. I am aware that Tsafendas possessed a large quantity of literature but did not take note of the names of the books he read.”⁶²⁸⁵

⁶²⁸² Johannes Jacobus Botha statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²⁸³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 32.

⁶²⁸⁴ Robert Harpur Smith statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Tsafendas's comments to Smith and Ross vividly reflect the strength of his passion for Communism and his detestation of the South African government and its policies. They stand out in strong contrast to the generalised, fourteen-word statement by the Commission, that “he expressed himself strongly against the South African Government and in favour of Communism.” The vigour and intelligence of Tsafendas's condemnations challenge his diagnosis as schizophrenic at his summary trial. In condensing Tsafendas's views into a single sentence of indirect speech, the Commission deprives the reader of any sense of the man's convictions and thus his personality.

On the other hand, another section of the Report reproduces word for word what Tsafendas said to Dr. Sakinofsky about his political ideas. These too were strongly anti-government but they were discounted as the beliefs of a “deluded” person and therefore irrelevant and not to be taken seriously. They were included only to support the idea that Tsafendas was incapable of clear political thought. Thus the Report goes into detail when dealing with something negative about Tsafendas or something that will fit with the schizophrenic picture, but is much less detailed with anything that contradicts such an image. Tsafendas's words to those many witnesses flatly contradicted what he told Dr. Sakinofsky and what was heard about him at the summary trial, but the Commission chose to ignore them and write in vaguely generalised terms instead. In this way, it covered itself: it did not lie since Tsafendas had indeed spoken against the government, but by omitting his actual words, it ensured that the world did not learn the specifics of Tsafendas's beliefs or the truth of his passion. However, manipulative as ever, when it came to his so-called “deluded” comments, the Commission carried them in full.

Among the most important omissions were the description by Smith and Ross of Tsafendas as a “fanatic on politics,” well-versed on politics,” who “seldom spoke of anything else” This is what several other witnesses told the police and the author, too, some even describing him as a political animal. No mention of any of these statements is made in the Report. As we will see, even his arrest by the Portuguese in 1964 for political reasons will be attributed by the Commission simply to liquor.

⁶²⁸⁵ Kenneth Heugh Ross statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Another omission is that Tsafendas had, according to both these witnesses, “a large quantity of literature” with him. Why would the Commission omit such an innocuous statement? Certainly it was not of major importance that Tsafendas had many books with him. However, it is a positive aspect of his character rather than a negative one and as such is consigned to the dust-bin by the Commission which invariably prefers the negative. What is more, the books reference is not as unimportant as it might seem, since it shows Tsafendas in a positive light, suggesting that, as several other witnesses testified, Tsafendas was well-read, cultured and educated, and not the dumb and hopeless wreck portrayed at the summary trial and by the Commission’s report.

Tsafendas’s political ideas, as mentioned by both witnesses, are lucid, well-grounded and perfectly logical, including, for instance, his stated opposition to the political imprisonment of Communists on Robben Island, but this, like all the others, is omitted in favour of vague generalisations. This evasive tactic by the Commission is a major issue since Tsafendas’s own words could never be considered by a neutral observer to be the words of a deluded schizophrenic who murdered Dr. Verwoerd because of a tapeworm.

Tsafendas and the “Roman Catholic” Priest

Chapter II C, Paragraph 30 deals with the testimony of a Roman Catholic priest who informed J.J. Botha, a factory security officer, that Tsafendas was a Communist. Botha passed this statement to the police. In addition, the Report says Tsafendas told the priest that he had been to Russia and that was where he learned all the languages he could speak. According to the Report, the priest also said that Tsafendas was hostile towards the Roman Catholic Church and the South African government.⁶²⁸⁶ The Commission does not name the priest, referring to him only as “a Roman Catholic priest,” although it knew his identity since he had testified about meeting Tsafendas to the police and to the Commission itself. His name was Hanno Probst.

⁶²⁸⁶ Chapter II C, Paragraph 30.

Although the priest's two statements quoted above are correct, three other elements from his evidence are omitted. First, Father Probst denounced Tsafendas as a Communist to a second security officer, Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren. He described Tsafendas as a "Communist and a dangerous person" and asked van Vuuren to "get rid of him."⁶²⁸⁷ It seems the Commission found this unimportant or wished to avoid the reference to Tsafendas being a dangerous person. The second omission concerned a report of Tsafendas's links to young Blacks in a local reserve. Father Probst testified to the Commission that he suspected Tsafendas of having "some influence on the inhabitants of the Mangete Reserve. I say this because, during the period Demetrios Tsafendas stayed at Mandini, the youngsters in the Mangete Reserve became unruly and aggressive. This, however, is only suspicion because since the assassination of Dr. Verwoerd everything became quiet again and the youngsters controllable."⁶²⁸⁸

The Commission must have seen here the echo of something similar in Tsafendas's past. In Mozambique, Tsafendas had urged workers at a dock and at the Hume Pipe Company to go on strike. He had also toured the rural areas of Beira preaching in favour of Communism, for the independence of Mozambique and against the Portuguese policy of forced cotton. He was arrested and accused of "making subversive propaganda against the Portuguese government and spreading subversive propaganda among the native masses."⁶²⁸⁹ According to the police he pretended to be a Christian missionary spreading the word about religion, while in reality, he was preaching "under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique's independence..."⁶²⁹⁰ It is not impossible, given Tsafendas's past, that he did the same thing in the Mangete Reserve.

Finally, Father Probst testified that Tsafendas at one point started "swearing at the ⁶²⁸⁷ Father Hanno Probst statement to the COE, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA; Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren statement to the police, 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²⁸⁸ Father Hanno Probst statement to the COE, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²⁸⁹ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶²⁹⁰ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Andreas Babioulakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Costas Poriazis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

Mozambique government, saying it did nothing for the black people.”⁶²⁹¹ In thirteen words, Tsafendas demonstrated his antipathy for the colonialist government and his sympathy for the Blacks. It is not a hugely important statement but that it was omitted from the record is yet another example of Tsafendas's political engagement being hidden from the light of day.

TSAFENDAS AND ROWLEY ARENSTEIN

*Here he also made enquiries about the home address of an attorney Arenstein, a well-known communist.*⁶²⁹²

*Mrs. Theron, the wife of an attorney in Durban, gave evidence that on more than one occasion she had seen Tsafendas going to the office of the Arenstein referred to above. Tsafendas could not recollect the name Arenstein, but recognized a photograph of Arenstein as being that of a person resembling the attorney whom he went to consult in connection with a translation bureau which he wished to buy. He also explained in which building the office of the attorney he interviewed was, and this is exactly where Arenstein's office is situated. However, there are also other attorneys in the same building. Mr. Arenstein and his typist deny that Tsafendas ever visited him.*⁶²⁹³

Robert Smith, the night clerk at Durban Men's Home, told the police that Tsafendas had asked him if he knew Arenstein's residential address.⁶²⁹⁴ Esperanza Theron, wife of attorney Daniel B. Theron, testified to the police that the “offices occupied by my husband were situated adjacently the offices occupied by the listed communist, Rowley Arenstein. I was my husband's secretary and was thus always in the office. During 1965 or late 1964, I observed a White or Coloured male whom I have since identified from photographs in the newspapers as Demitrio Tsafendas, frequenting the offices of Rowley Arenstein. Demitrio Tsafendas used to pay visits to Arenstein's office regularly and on occasion he would greet me. I observed Demitrio Tsafendas actually entering the general office of Rowley Arenstein but am unable to state for what purpose he visited Arenstein. I am unable to state the period of time that he used to visit Arenstein, but the visits were very regular. I have also observed

⁶²⁹¹ Father Hanno Probst statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶²⁹² Chapter II C, Paragraph 32.

⁶²⁹³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 33.

⁶²⁹⁴ Robert Harpur Smith statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Demitrio Tsafendas in the presence of Rowley Arenstein walking down the corridor from Arenstein's office."⁶²⁹⁵

As result of Theron's testimony, Arenstein and Thelma Beryl Suddes, his secretary, were questioned by the police. She testified that "to the best" of her "knowledge" she had never seen Tsafendas in Arenstein's office.⁶²⁹⁶ Arenstein was questioned on September 24, 1966, by Brigadier Baster "at office No. 505, The Grays, Johannesburg, in connection with the assassination of the late Dr. Verwoerd."⁶²⁹⁷

At the time, Arenstein was in police custody accused of "furthering the aims of Communism" and was about to go on trial on such a charge. The last thing he wanted at such a time was to be involved with Tsafendas and the assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. Was it remotely possible that he would admit to knowing Tsafendas? The same would apply to his secretary. The logic of their circumstances demanded that both would deny any knowledge of Dr. Verwoerd's alleged assassin. On October 31, 1966, Arenstein was sentenced to four years' imprisonment under the Suppression of Communism Act for furthering the aims of Communism.⁶²⁹⁸

Tsafendas later spoke at length to Father Minas Constandinou about meeting in Durban with a "Jewish Communist lawyer." The priest could not remember the name of the lawyer, but Ronnie Kasrils stated in a personal interview by the author that at the time "Arenstein was the only Jewish Communist lawyer in Durban."⁶²⁹⁹ Tsafendas was probably given his name by someone from the anti-apartheid movement in London.

Tsafendas's statement to the Commission has gone missing and therefore the author cannot know exactly what he said in evidence. According to the Commission's Report, Tsafendas did not remember Arenstein's name, but said he recognized a photograph of him as "a person resembling the attorney he went to consult in connection with a translation bureau which he wished to buy." Tsafendas's reply is very smart. Obviously realising that someone had seen him in Arenstein's office, he made up a story about a translation bureau as ⁶²⁹⁵ Eperanza Theron statement to the police, 24 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²⁹⁶ Thelma Beryl Suddes statement to the COE, 22 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²⁹⁷ Johannes Christoffel Broodryk statement to the COE, 24 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶²⁹⁸ South Africa History Online (n.d) Rowley Israel Arenstein.

⁶²⁹⁹ Ronnie Kasrils in a personal interview, 16 May 2016.

an explanation for meeting innocently with Arenstein. This was less risky than a flat denial since he could not be aware of who had testified.

What is surprising is that the Commission seemed to accept Tsafendas's word and Arenstein's denial. The explanation presumably was its readiness to downplay Tsafendas's political associations and activities, especially in connection with prominent Communists and anti-apartheid activists. An earlier example of this was Tsafendas's association with David Gardener, Solly Sachs and Rev. Canon Collins which were omitted completely.

TSAFENDAS'S THREAT AGAINST DR. VERWOERD

On 10th July, 1964, Mr. Vercuiel dismissed Tsafendas from employment with Messrs. F. A. Poole (Pty.), Ltd., because of the untidiness of his work and his constant quarrelling with the other workers. Mr. Vercuiel gave evidence that Tsafendas was most upset about this and uttered the following threat:

"You are just like your bloody Government. I will get you. I will also get your Prime Minister."

Mr. Vercuiel said that at the time he did not report this threat to any person, but when he heard that Tsafendas had stabbed Dr. Verwoerd to death, he immediately recalled the incident. In a statement in writing made in September, 1966, the alleged threat is worded as follows:

"You are just like your bloody Government. I will kill your Prime Minister yet." Mr. Vercuiel made a favourable impression, but the possibility that his memory played him false after such a long time had elapsed cannot be excluded."⁶³⁰⁰

This incident seems to be of no great importance, since Tsafendas's remarks are the sort of thing anyone might say in the heat of the moment. What is surprising is the Commission's attempt to downplay the flare-up by suggesting that Vercuiel might have got things wrong because of the passage of time. In fact, two years had passed since the incident, and the Commission did not offer the same excuse for witnesses' evidence made more than two years ago, for example Antony Maw, who described in detail events from 1951. The fact that the wording in the two statements is slightly different does not mean the witness misremembered the incident. The import of the statement is the same.

⁶³⁰⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 10.

TSAFENDAS'S CHARACTERISATIONS OF DR. VERWOERD

Apart from reproducing Vercuiel's comment, the Report does not refer to anything Tsafendas said about Dr. Verwoerd, although several witnesses reported comments he freely made. Tsafendas himself spoke about the Prime Minister when questioned by the police. He said that he considered Dr. Verwoerd was not the true representative of South Africa. "I wanted to see a government representing all the South African people. I do not think the Nationalist Government is representative of the people and I wanted to see a different government."⁶³⁰¹ He further told the police that he was "disgusted with his (Dr. Verwoerd's) racial policies" and he said, "I always had a grudge against the South African Government on account of its racial policies and I hated Dr. Verwoerd because he was a foreigner - a Hollander."⁶³⁰² (The issue of foreigner/Hollander is discussed extensively in the previous chapter).

The fact that Tsafendas did not consider Dr. Verwoerd to be properly representative of all the South African people was something that the police and almost certainly the Commission were told by several witnesses. They testified that Tsafendas described Dr. Verwoerd as a dictator and a tyrant who oppressed his people and he regularly characterised him as "Hitler's best student." In addition, Jacobus Bornman, told the police that Tsafendas "often criticised the government, his exact words I don't remember, but it seemed to me that he had a grudge against Dr. Verwoerd."⁶³⁰³ Edward Furness testified that Tsafendas wanted "to create a resistance to the regime of South Africa and mentioned civil disobedience and anything that would get the South African regime out of power."⁶³⁰⁴ None of these opinions which so animated Tsafendas finds any mention in the Report.

⁶³⁰¹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. COE, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁰² Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. COE, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁰³ Jacobus Johannes Bornman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³⁰⁴ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

TSAFENDAS'S ATTEMPT TO RECRUIT PEOPLE FOR AN UPRISING IN SOUTH AFRICA

*Evidence was submitted to the Commission that Tsafendas had tried to recruit people to take part in an uprising in South Africa. He admits that he did in fact try to recruit people for an uprising, but says that his aim was confined to the Territory of Mozambique.*⁶³⁰⁵

*He denied that he had ever tried to canvass support in London for an uprising in South Africa. His efforts, he said, were confined to Portuguese territories.*⁶³⁰⁶

The Commission here makes an important revelation: that Tsafendas, while in England, attempted to recruit people for an uprising. According to the Report, Tsafendas denied that he tried to bring about an uprising in South Africa and said it was meant for Mozambique. Whichever country was to be involved, the plan demonstrated Tsafendas's passion and dedication to his goal. That goal was clearly stated by a witness to the Commission, Edward Furness, but was not included in the Report: he wanted "to create a resistance to the regime of South Africa and mentioned civil disobedience and anything that would get the South African regime out of power."⁶³⁰⁷ That was in the early 1960s, half a decade before the assassination, a pointer to Tsafendas's commitment to his intention.

The Report said Tsafendas's remarks about the uprisings were disclosed when "evidence was submitted to the Commission." However, no such evidence was found in NASA. This is no great surprise, since a great deal of evidence have gone missing, especially those portraying Tsafendas as a revolutionary. That this evidence is missing is further clear proof that important evidence disappeared from NASA. The Commission has omitted several very important incidents showing Tsafendas as a revolutionary person. In this case it did publish a report reflecting Tsafendas's revolutionary nature, but it would best be described as a "bare-bones" account.

PIDE'S FILE ON TSAFENDAS

PIDE had a file on Tsafendas since 1938 but lied to the South African police that they did not. This was obviously an attempt to withhold any information pointing to Tsafendas as "a partisan for the independence of Mozambique.”⁶³⁰⁸ However, just one day after the assassination, the South African embassy in Lisbon, citing “a reliable local source,” revealed that Tsafendas “has a criminal record in Mozambique, where he is said to have been arrested on several occasions after creating public disturbances, including shouting pro-Communist anti-Portuguese slogans.” The embassy even warned the South African police that “If information correct, we suspect Portuguese may play down assassin’s previous political activities and we would suggest full details in this connection be sought.”⁶³⁰⁹ The Commission, like the South African police, was aware of the above information. However, it seems that it did not make any further inquiries but simply accepted what was given to it by the Portuguese.

⁶³⁰⁵ Chapter II B, Paragraph 32.

⁶³⁰⁶ Chapter II D, Paragraph 18.

⁶³⁰⁷ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

TSAFENDAS’S ARGUMENT WITH A COLLEAGUE ABOUT SALAZAR

*A Portuguese who was also employed by the firm said that Tsafendas had assumed a hostile attitude towards him because he had refused to discuss Dr. Salazar with him.*⁶³¹⁰

The Commission here tells only half of the story. According to Antonio Teixeira Da Silva, the Portuguese colleague in question, Tsafendas first asked him what he did in Mozambique. Da Silva told him that he had served in the Portuguese Army for three years. According to Da Silva, Tsafendas asked what salary he got and whether the army had often had trouble with the natives. Tsafendas then asked him for his opinion of Salazar, which he refused to discuss. Tsafendas then became hostile towards him.⁶³¹¹

Tsafendas strongly supported Mozambique’s independence from Portugal and wanted to see “a Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they white or black, and therefore separated from the mother nation.”⁶³¹² For this reason, he repeatedly conducted “subversive” propaganda in Mozambique, seeking to raise awareness about Communism and the possible independence of Mozambique. His activities there led to his five arrests by the Portuguese police, imprisonment and torture, the loss of at least three jobs and the creation of ⁶³⁰⁸ Top Secret letter of the head Inspector of PIDE in Lisbon to the Subdirector of PIDE in Mozambique regarding Demitrio Tsafendas, 8 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶³⁰⁹ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Lisbon, to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 07 September 1966. K150, Vol. 7, File: 09/04 Suspect Persons Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³¹⁰ Chapter III C, Paragraph 8.

⁶³¹¹ Antonio Teixeira Da Silva statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³¹² PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 8 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

a PIDE file (n° 10.415)6313 which got fatter with every passing year, finally reaching around 130 pages. According to Inspector Horacio Ferreira, of the Portuguese Security Police in Mozambique, Tsafendas was “intense anti-White” and told him that “the Portuguese Government has never done anything for their non-Whites.”⁶³¹⁴

Peter Pappas, whose café in Durban Tsafendas often visited, said Tsafendas “spoke angrily about the Salazar regime in Portugal and about the Mozambique police.”⁶³¹⁵ While in Cape Town, Tsafendas visited Mr. N.D. Hartford, a reporter with the Cape Argus. He described himself as “a rebel from Mozambique,” and asked him if there was any news of the freedom fighters there, saying he was interested in their efforts to overthrow Portuguese rule in Mozambique. Tsafendas refused to serve in the Portuguese Army because, he said, he “did not want to serve a dictatorship.”⁶³¹⁶ Albert Vercueil, Tsafendas’s foreman at F.A. Poole, testified that Tsafendas “was well-built and strong, and bullied the other Portuguese workers.”⁶³¹⁷ Tsafendas did the same in other jobs with Portuguese workers who were supportive of Salazar’s regime.⁶³¹⁸ Thus it seems unlikely that Tsafendas became hostile towards Da Silva simply because he refused to discuss Salazar with him. Far more likely is that Tsafendas was angered that Da Silva had served in the Portuguese Army and perhaps concluded that he supported the Salazar regime.

JACOBUS BORNMAN

*Mr. Bornman, who occupied the same room as Tsafendas, stated that Tsafendas did not show any signs of being mentally abnormal. He was good-natured, but had messy habits. His topics, of conversation were politics and women. He was strongly opposed to the policy of the Government. He read only English-language newspapers and was sometimes upset by what he had read. At times he passed the remark that the Government was doing so much for the Coloureds that it would be better for him to be a Coloured.*⁶³¹⁹

⁶³¹³ Secret Criminal Record n° 10.415 of Demitrios Tsafantakis. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶³¹⁴ Col. van Wyk’s report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶³¹⁵ Rand Daily Mail, 14 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas: in the eyes of a friend.’

⁶³¹⁶ The Cape Argus, 7 September 1966: 3. ‘Brainwashed in jail held man told Argus.’

⁶³¹⁷ Albert Vercueil statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³¹⁸ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶³¹⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 58.

Bornman was Tsafendas's roommate for six to seven weeks in Mrs. Groves's boarding house. Although the Commission's Report includes some positive comments about Tsafendas made by Bornman, they are few and far between in comparison to his full testimony, while some important comments are missing. Bornman testified that "Tsafendas's conversations were always about women and politics. He never talked about anything else. Tsafendas was dissatisfied with conditions in R.S.A and he has often criticized the government, his exact words I don't remember, but it seemed to me that he had a grudge against Dr. Verwoerd. He stood up a lot for the Coloureds." The Commission admits Bornman's remark that Tsafendas strongly opposed the policy of the government, but omits that Tsafendas "stood up a lot for the Coloureds," a most important statement since Tsafendas was portrayed at the summary trial as "unsympathetic towards the Coloureds."

Also important was Bornman saying Tsafendas seemed to have "a grudge against Dr. Verwoerd." Several other witnesses reported similar, even stronger, remarks by Tsafendas, for instance that he considered Dr. Verwoerd to be a dictator and a tyrant, and that he described him as "Hitler's best student." None of the above statements was included in the Report. The Report finally states that Tsafendas told Bornman he would have been better off as a Coloured than a White because the Government was doing "so much for them." Bornman has made no such comment in his statement to the police on October 3, which means that he probably made it to the Commission hearing. Forty-four witnesses who were interviewed by the author said they never heard Tsafendas make any such comment and they could not believe he held such opinions. It is not impossible that Tsafendas was being sarcastic, as he often was, according to several friends the author interviewed. The fact is, however, that the Commission included the disputed statement and omitted the one about standing up for the Coloureds.

Although Bornman's lively, first-person statement was one of the most positive about Tsafendas, the Commission downplayed it significantly by omitting crucial comments and reducing it to five flatly-delivered sentences. Bornman's comments regarding Tsafendas's personality are examined in the section 'Landlords and Flatmates' of this chapter.

SOUTH AFRICAN RAILWAYS AND HARBOURS

On one occasion while he was working there, he intimated that to his mind the South African Government was handling its Bantu problems better than Great Britain was dealing with *problems in connection with the West Indians.*⁶³²⁰

No statement to this effect or any like evidence was found in the archives and none of Tsafendas's colleagues at this job testified to his saying anything of the sort. It is always possible that such a statement was among testimony that has gone missing. In those circumstances, the author cannot know how and when Tsafendas made the remark attributed to him and how faithful the Commission's account is to his words. What is certain is that this is a statement which shows support for the apartheid government and it is not what Tsafendas believed. Working for a governmental enterprise, it would have been very stupid for Tsafendas publicly to attack the government, as he often did with people he knew.

Statements that show Tsafendas's real political ideas are listed earlier in this study and later in this chapter. It is important to mention that once again the Commission has included a statement portraying Tsafendas as a supporter of the apartheid government while omitting several where he condemned the government and affirmed his anti-apartheid, anti-colonialist and Communist beliefs. The statement in question was read to forty-four people who knew Tsafendas well and every single one declared that he could never have meant what he was quoted as saying. For reasons of space, the names of the forty-four will not be listed here; but their testimonies, along with the issue in general, have already been discussed extensively in chapters Four ("Tsafendas Meets His Lawyers") and Five ("Dr. Cooper's Testimony").

TSAFENDAS'S FIVE PASSPORTS

The South African and Portuguese Press reported that on one of his arrests in Mozambique, Tsafendas was found to be in possession of five passports.⁶³²¹ However, the Report makes no mention of this. Even if it believed the reports to be mere rumours, one would have expected the Commission to investigate the issue. After all, it had probed and dismissed other rumours involving conspiracies about the assassination and Tsafendas's past, some of them considerably more far-fetched than this one.

⁶³²⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 26.

⁶³²¹ Dagbreek, 11 September 1966, 'Tsafendas het vir V.V. in Persie gewerk.'; Daily Mirror, 9 September 1966: 11, 'The clouded past of an assassin'; The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, 'Tsafendas seen as 'mystery man''; The Herald (Melbourne), 8 September 1966: 1, 'The killer: Five passports and a record of subversion'; The Rhodesia Herald, 8 September 1966: 1, 'Assassin said to have been deported from P.E.A. for Communist connection'; The Star, 9 September 1966: 5, 'More uncovered on assassin's history'; The Star, 10 September 1966: 3, 'Assassin had five passports.'

There was certainly nothing sinister about the five passports, which were almost certainly old passports Tsafendas had held onto. PIDE made no mention of them in their reports. Had the passports been forgeries or suspect in any way, this would have been stated by PIDE in its reports. Even if the information had been omitted from PIDE's reports for the South African police, it would certainly have been included in their own secret and confidential reports after the arrest. Furthermore, four witnesses confirmed that Tsafendas did indeed keep some, if not all, of his old passports. Mary Eendracht, Ira Kyriakakis and Andreas Babiolakis told the author that Tsafendas retained his out-dated passports as souvenirs.⁶³²² A Greek man in Mozambique named Manuel Tsokos also told The Star, one of the newspapers that published the story of the five passports, that Tsafendas had "several different passports."⁶³²³

The Commission omitted the reference to five passports from its Report for what seem to be obvious reasons: that such information could have fuelled conspiracy theories suggesting that Tsafendas was a hired assassin or part of a Communist plot and was therefore much more than a helpless human being. There was, in fact, a perfectly logical explanation for the passports, but the Commission chose to avoid all mention of the subject, presumably to avoid adding to the rumours.

EVIDENCE REGARDING TSAFENDAS'S POLITICAL IDEAS WHICH HAVE BEEN OMITTED BY THE COMMISSION

The following comments are taken from statements given to the police and the Commission by people who knew Tsafendas. All were in the Commission's possession but were omitted from its Report. On occasion, the Commission referred to some of these witnesses and some of the things they said, but they omitted their political comments:

- Edward Furness, who met him in London, testified that Tsafendas wanted to "create a resistance to the regime of South Africa and mentioned civil disobedience and anything that would get the South African regime out of power." Furthermore, he testified that ⁶³²² Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015.

⁶³²³ The Star, 10 September 1966: 3, 'Assassin had five passports.'

Tsafendas was a regular visitor to the offices of the British anti-apartheid movement and that he had seen him in the company of members of the movement, including David Gardener. He had also mentioned that Tennyson Makiwane, the ANC representative in London, was regularly present in the offices and often gave speeches there.⁶³²⁴

- Kenneth Ross was Tsafendas's landlord in Durban for two months in 1965. He testified that Tsafendas was "very fond of discussing politics and gave me the opinion that he was well versed in politics. Tsafendas objected to the Communists being banished to Robin Island because of their political opinions and actions. In general, Tsafendas opposed to every decision taken by the South African Government and freely voiced his opinion to me. He was blatantly opposed to the National Party policy, the policy of the present Government, and was definitely pre-Russian."⁶³²⁵
- Jacobus Bornman testified that Tsafendas "stood up a lot for the Coloureds" and "often criticised the South African government and seemed to have a grudge against Dr. Verwoerd."⁶³²⁶ Bornman is mentioned in the Report but it carries none of these comments. His case is discussed in detail earlier in this section.
- Robert Smith was a night clerk at the Durban Men's Home where Tsafendas stayed for two months in 1965. He testified that Tsafendas was "a Communist," "a fanatic on politics and seldom spoke of anything else" and had described "United Party and National Party officials and members as capitalistic roughs." Tsafendas had told him that the "South African Government's policy was "rotten" and often compared conditions in South Africa with those of Russia, to South Africa's detriment, stating, "Look at all the poor people in South Africa... such conditions don't exist in Russia because Russia is a Communistic state." More importantly, Smith had testified to the police that Tsafendas had told him that when he lived in London he had associated with Rev. Canon John Collins and Solly Sachs, both leading members of the British anti-apartheid movement.⁶³²⁷
- According to Inspector Horacio Ferreira, of the Portuguese Security Police in

⁶³²⁴ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³²⁵ Kenneth Heugh Ross statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³²⁶ Jacobus Johannes Borman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³²⁷ Robert Harpur Smith statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Mozambique, Tsafendas was “intense anti-White” and told him that “the Portuguese Government has never done anything for their non-Whites.”⁶³²⁸

- Patrick O’Ryan told the police that Tsafendas “was against the state policy of both South Africa and Portugal” and that he “labelled the apartheid policies as unfair.”⁶³²⁹ O’Ryan is mentioned in the Report but these comments are not. His case is examined earlier in this section.
- Johannes Botha, a security officer, told the police that Nick Vergos characterised Tsafendas in a remark to him as the “biggest Communist in the Republic of South Africa.”⁶³³⁰ The Commission refers to Botha and to Vergos, but these comments are omitted. His case is discussed in the “Vergos Case” section of this chapter.
- Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren, a security officer at the Mandini Paper Factory in Zululand, told the police that Nick Vergos said Tsafendas “was not Greek, but a kaffir and a Communist.”⁶³³¹
- Father Hanno Probst reported Tsafendas to a security officer as a “communist and a dangerous person.”⁶³³² He suspected Tsafendas of stirring up disaffection among young non-Whites in the Mangete Reserve. “I say this because during the period Demetrios Tsafendas stayed at Mandini, the youngsters in the Mangete Reserve became unruly and aggressive. This, however, is only suspicion, because since the assassination of Dr. Verwoerd everything became quiet again and the youngsters controllable.”⁶³³³
- Roelof Swiegers testified that Tsafendas “leaned towards the communist side.”⁶³³⁴
- Keith Martincich testified that Tsafendas “on quite a few occasions he had discussed politics with me. He said he did not like the Government and that he was given a hard ⁶³²⁸ Col. van Wyk’s report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶³²⁹ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶³³⁰ Johannes Jacobus Botha statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³³¹ Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren statement to the police, 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³³² Father Hanno Probst statement to the COE, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA; Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren statement to the police, 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³³³ Father Hanno Probst statement to the COE, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³³⁴ Roelof Erasmus Swiegers statement to the police, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van vorm Z 204. NASA.

time in South Africa. He said the Government won't reign very long."⁶³³⁵ The Commission refers to Martincich, but these comments are omitted.

- Elizabeth Groves was Tsafendas's landlady for six or seven weeks and a retired psychiatric nurse. About Tsafendas she said, "I received complaints that he was argumentative and towards me he said that we Afrikaners are a backward nation. It was clear that he had nothing good towards Afrikaners."⁶³³⁶ The Commission refers to Mrs. Groves, but these comments are omitted. Her case is discussed in the 'Landlords and flatmates' section.
- Antony Maw testified that the Portuguese authorities in Mozambique did not allow Tsafendas to enter the country on grounds of suspected Communist tendencies.⁶³³⁷
- A report from Col. van Wyk of the South African police characterised Tsafendas as being regarded in Mozambique as "intensely anti-white."⁶³³⁸
- Peter Pappas, whose café in Durban Tsafendas often visited, said Tsafendas "spoke angrily about the Salazar regime in Portugal and about the Mozambique police."⁶³³⁹
- Reports from Mozambique which emerged after the assassination said that Tsafendas was "violently anti-Portuguese."⁶³⁴⁰
- Gladstone Dunn testified that Tsafendas expressed the opinion that the South African Government "was not playing fair with the non-Whites. He said that the wages paid to non-Whites was very unsatisfactory, as well as the political situation."⁶³⁴¹

CONCLUSION

Although the Report referenced some of Tsafendas's political activities, it fell far short of describing the full extent of his political involvements. Apart from one particular instance, that Tsafendas urged an uprising against the colonial rulers of Mozambique, all the information the Commission presented was already in the public domain through the media.

⁶³³⁵ Keith Terrence Bertram Martincich statement to the police, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³³⁶ Elizabeth Magdalene Groves statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³³⁷ Antony Maw statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub File: 1/8. NASA.

⁶³³⁸ Col. van Wyk's report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶³³⁹ Rand Daily Mail, 14 September 1966, 'Tsafendas: in the eyes of a friend.'

⁶³⁴⁰ The Cape Argus, 7 September 1966: 1, '180-day prison for Tsafendas?'

⁶³⁴¹ Gladstone Dunn statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA

Furthermore, the incidents mentioned are frequently downplayed or misinterpreted, in particular in regard to Tsafendas's Communist and anti-apartheid links. The most glaring omissions are that Tsafendas had associated in London with leading anti-apartheid activists such Solly Sachs, Rev. Canon John Collins and David Gardener, some of his prison terms under the Portuguese due to his Communist and anti-Portuguese activities, the fact that he was exiled from Mozambique for twelve years because of these activities and that he fought with the Communists in the Greek Civil War.

It is notable that the Commission went to great lengths to locate John Michaletos, a Greek Communist childhood friend of Tsafendas who recruited him in the Democratic Army, the military wing of the Greek Communist Party during the Civil War. Despite the Commission's efforts, no mention of Michaletos is made in the Report. That Tsafendas was described by several witnesses as a Communist and by one as "the biggest Communist in the Republic" are omitted.⁶³⁴² Generally, Tsafendas's Communist activities and statements are downplayed as incompatible with the picture of him crafted from evidence by the Commission and the police.

A very important omission is that PIDE had a file on Tsafendas since 1938. Although PIDE lied to the South African police that they had no such file, South Africa's embassy in Lisbon had informed its superiors in Cape Town of the existence of just such a file. What is more, the embassy warned that the Portuguese would attempt to downplay Tsafendas's political activities, which is exactly what they did. Nevertheless, still the South African police appeared to accept at face value what the Portuguese gave them.

Evidence that Tsafendas was clearly a political animal, an anti-apartheid fanatic, a Communist, and a committed supporter of an independent Mozambique finds no place in the Report. Omitted also are his descriptions of Dr. Verwoerd as a dictator and a tyrant, as well as his oft-repeated characterisation of Dr. Verwoerd as "Hitler's best student."

Not only is Tsafendas's ideology absent, but so are the words he used to describe and explain it to his friends and acquaintances, to the South African police and to PIDE. This is important because it deprived readers of the opportunity to know exactly what Tsafendas believed and to decide how "deluded" he was, or indeed whether he was deluded at all. When someone repeated to the police various specific remarks Tsafendas had made about politics, ⁶³⁴² Johannes Jacobus Botha statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

the Commission would generalise or summarise the statements, instead of using Tsafendas's own words, as related by the witness. An example of this is seen with two witnesses in Durban Men's Home. Tsafendas's exact remarks to them are omitted in favour of a woolly paraphrase by the Commission that Tsafendas "expressed himself strongly against the South African Government and in favour of Communism."⁶³⁴³

It would have been revealing to learn exactly what Tsafendas said when he condemned the government and in what terms he expressed his preference for Communism. However, his words did not sound like the words of a madman and this could well have been why they were not included. On the other hand, the Commission did include Tsafendas's own words to the psychiatrists. The comments which Tsafendas made to Dr. Sakinofsky are also against the South African government, but they are considered "deluded" and apolitical.

The Commission has not included even one of the many statements made by Tsafendas about his political ideas to the South African and Mozambican police or to people who knew him. If this was done, it would have been obvious that Tsafendas said completely different things to his psychiatrists than he did to his friends and acquaintances; what he told his friends and acquaintances were serious and clear political thoughts, also compatible with what he told the police, something that did not fit with the portrayal of Tsafendas at the court.

The following is a short summary of Tsafendas's political activities which were omitted by the Commission:

- The Commission refers to Tsafendas's involvement with the British anti-apartheid movement and that he was noticed "in the company of leftists," but fails to name any of these leftists, when it was known to Judge van Wyk that he had met and associated with prominent members of the movement such as Tennyson Makiwane, Rev. Canon John Collins, David Gardener and Solly Sachs.
- That Tsafendas, while in London, had a friendly association with Commander Thomas Fox-Pitt, the secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society and one of the leading figures in the modern anti-slavery movement.⁶³⁴⁴
- His participation alongside the Communists during the Greek Civil War.
- That he was considered by PIDE to be "a partisan for the independence of Mozambique."

⁶³⁴³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 32.

⁶³⁴⁴ The Guardian, 30 September 1966: 10, 'Winding back'; Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

- He was accused by PIDE of preaching “under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique’s independence...”
- The true reasons for his imprisonment in Lisbon in 1949.
- His arrest and imprisonment in Lourenço Marques in 1951.
- That he was allowed to enter Mozambique and deported in 1951 because of his Communist and anti-Portuguese activities in the 1930s.
- He was exiled from Mozambique for twelve years and was allowed to return in 1963 only after he received amnesty by the Portuguese government.
- His arrest and imprisonment in Lisbon in 1952.
- The true reasons for his imprisonment in Beira in 1964.
- His arrest in February 1965 in Beira.
- That PIDE had a file on him since 1938, the Secret Criminal Record n° 10.415 of Demitrios Tsafantakis. However, this was not known to the Commission as PIDE lied about it to the South African authorities.

Why did the Commission omit the facts that Tsafendas was a passionate Communist who had participated in a military conflict with the Communists and had associated with members of the British anti-apartheid movement in London? Gordon Winter, who worked as a journalist for the Post and the Citizen, while he was also a BOSS agent and very good friend of H.J. van den Bergh, the man in charge of the Tsafendas police investigation, said that it was because the General wanted to downplay and even omit Tsafendas’s Communist activities and beliefs.⁶³⁴⁵ Why? Winter’s explanation seems more than just logical:

“He [General van den Bergh] didn’t want it in. It’s an embarrassment for him that this man who was a) dangerous, b) mad, c) Coloured, got a job at the House of Assembly, and HJ’s policemen or security... it doesn’t matter about going to work Pelindaba or whatever you call it, for a uranium base or whatever. This is not a Kruger Park ranger job; we’re talking about in the House of Assembly. It’s embarrassing for HJ, the supremo of intelligence, for his mob to allow this lunatic – if he was a lunatic – into the House of Assembly, and he then went in with two daggers. That’s some security! No wonder they wanted to keep it quiet ... if there was a political motive, it’s hardly pro-South Africa. And if it was a political motive, surely wouldn’t the Kremlin get some benefit from that? A nice bit of propaganda. You don't want that. The reds under the beds in South Africa were the enemy. We don't let them score victories. Think about it. Its common sense."⁶³⁴⁶

⁶³⁴⁵ Gordon Winter in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997.

Common sense indeed...

⁶³⁴⁶ Gordon Winter in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997.

TSAFENDAS'S CHARACTER ACCORDING TO THE COMMISSION

In its determination to prove that Tsafendas was mad, the Commission distorted, manipulated and ignored the evidence of witnesses on a comprehensive scale, manufacturing an unrecognisable caricature to suit its purposes. In what can only be described as character assassination, it employed a series of unfounded characterisations to misrepresent Tsafendas's actions and intentions. Its basic tactic was to omit from its Report anything positive, while including everything negative.

An appraisal of the statistics proves this beyond dispute. Of the two hundred witnesses who were interviewed by the police and the Commission, 44 made positive statements about Tsafendas's character or in some way contradicted the Report's negative picture. Of the rest, 6 made negative comments, while the others had nothing either positive or negative to say about him. In percentage terms, that means 22% of statements were positive, 3% were negative and the remaining 75% were neutral. However, the Commission used only 1 of the 44 positive comments, that is only 2.2%, while at the same time using 100% of the negative. Even the single positive reference, by Bornman, that Tsafendas was "good-natured,"⁶³⁴⁷ is a drop in the ocean in comparison with the totality of Bornman's favourable testimony. This must be more than a coincidence. In short, everything that supported the theory that Tsafendas was mad or as described by the psychiatrists at his summary trial is included, while everything that contradicts it is omitted.

If two hundred people are asked about a particular person, many different opinions will be volunteered. For some, a person like Tsafendas might be a freedom fighter, for others a terrorist. To a university professor, he might appear uneducated while an ill-educated person could conclude he was a professor. Well-bred people might think him rude and boorish, others that he is excessively polite. The safest way to judge someone is generally by his actions, although personal opinions cannot be discounted, especially when the vast majority say exactly same thing. The Commission has described Tsafendas with the following characterizations: maladjusted, rejected, frustrated, feckless rolling-stone, boastful, selfish, unscrupulous and crafty. Let's examine them one by one:

⁶³⁴⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 58.

BOASTFUL

Of the two hundred witnesses who were questioned by the police and the Commission, only one testified that Tsafendas was “boastful.” This was Wilhelmina de Vos, the same woman who told the police that she “considered him to be a completely normal person”⁶³⁴⁸ and then told the Commission that he was mad.⁶³⁴⁹ The Commission refers to this incident in Chapter II C, Paragraph 65.

The Commission makes two more references to Tsafendas's alleged boastfulness. One is that he appeared to be boastful while working at City Engineering (Chapter II C, Paragraph 7):

*“On 9th December, 1963, he was employed as a fitter by Messrs. City Engineers and Carron Ltd. He was asked to resign and left the firm on 3rd February, 1964. Here he displayed signs of boastfulness.”*⁶³⁵⁰

Johannes Benade, a colleague at City Engineers and Carron Ltd, said Tsafendas “pretended to be a welder fitter. According to the work he delivered, it was clear that he did not have much knowledge on the subject, and as a result he was dismissed on 03/02/64.”⁶³⁵¹ However, D.G. Gallard, the secretary of the company, in a letter to the Commission of Enquiry, did not mention anything about Tsafendas being dismissed or being asked to resign. The letter simply stated that Tsafendas resigned, without offering an explanation or further detail.⁶³⁵² Neither Benade nor Gallard said anything about Tsafendas being boastful, unless the Commission considered such an attitude to be implicit in Tsafendas's “pretending to be a welder fitter,” in the contemptuous opinion of Benade. The statements by these two witnesses are the only ones found in the archives from employees of this company.

The same applies to the incident described in Chapter IV, Paragraph 3, which states,

“These stories probably owe their origin to the two drafts of R20 each which Tsafendas's brother-in-law sent to him for furniture which had been sold, the payments which Tsafendas received from the Hume Pipe Co., and Tsafendas's statement to the Greek ⁶³⁴⁸ Wilhelmina Sophia de Vos statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³⁴⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 65.

⁶³⁵⁰ Chapter III C, Paragraph 7.

⁶³⁵¹ Johannes Tobias Benade statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶³⁵² Report by D.G. Gallard of City Engineering and Carron Limited regarding Demitrio Tsafendas to the Commission of Enquiry, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 6, File: 3. NASA.

Consul that he had received R5,000 from South Africa ... his statement to the Greek Consul is typical of a boastfulness which he displayed from time to time."

The Greek Consul mentioned is Captain P.A. Sanianos, the Consul in Beira, who had mentioned that Tsafendas received R5.000 from his family, as stated in the same part of the Report. A South African police report said Sanianos told them he had several conversations with Tsafendas, who he regarded as "a very intelligent person."⁶³⁵³ Sanianos made no mention of boastfulness or anything that could be taken as such. His full statement is available in the Investigation chapter. It seems highly unlikely that Sanianos made another statement to the Commission; he was not on the list to give evidence to the Commission and he lived permanently in Beira and the only statements that he or anyone else in Beira made were those given to Lt.-Col. van Wyk. Therefore, there seems to be no foundation for the claim that Tsafendas appeared boastful to the Greek Consul.

The author asked forty-four witnesses who knew Tsafendas, including several who knew him extremely well and for many years, whether he was boastful. All strongly rejected such a description.

MALADJUSTED

This word is defined by the Oxford Living Dictionaries as "failing to cope with the demands of a normal social environment." It is difficult to know in which way the Commission believed Tsafendas to be maladjusted. He grew up a happy child in a loving family environment, coped well and interacted normally with his classmates when sent away to boarding school, and from the age of eighteen looked after himself and forged his own future. He spent several years at sea during World War Two servicing Allied ships, and after the war travelled through at seventeen countries.

Wherever he went, he managed to find work, ranging from welding, which was his trade, to bus conducting, to selling goods on commission or teaching English. He read widely and came to adopt firm political principles, which, when he acted on them, brought him periods in exile and prison. On several occasions, he managed to secure his release by deceiving the authorities. To describe such a person as maladjusted is to misunderstand the meaning of the word. Tsafendas coped with the “normal social environment” with ease and aplomb.

⁶³⁵³ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

REJECTED/FRUSTRATED/OUTCAST

Apart from Dr. Cooper, who spoke at the summary trial of Tsafendas's alleged frustration, there is no evidence that he was frustrated. None of the two hundred witnesses who were interviewed by the Commission and the police or the forty-four who spoke to the author testified that Tsafendas was frustrated. As for being rejected and outcast, these are also inaccurate characterizations and it something that has been discussed extensively in the sections covering his relationships with his family and with the Greek community in this chapter.

FECKLESS ROLLING STONE

Calling Tsafendas a “feckless rolling-stone” is like calling Odysseus the same. Tsafendas never travelled aimlessly or just for the sake of it. Wherever he went was for a purpose. He was banned from South Africa and Mozambique and was prosecuted in Portugal. As result of this, he travelled either to find employment (Sweden, Germany, England), or because he was deported there (Greece and Germany again), or because counties were on the way to his destination (Syria, Lebanon, France, Spain, Denmark, Italy) or simply for a holiday (Bulgaria, Rhodesia, Greece again).

The Commission was aware that Tsafendas was forced to spend the years from 1951 to 1963 in exile since he was banned from Mozambique, the country of his birth, because of his pro-Communist and anti-colonialist activities. It was also aware that at the same period he was also barred from South Africa because he was a “half-caste” and a Communist. In the years up to 1963, Tsafendas made nine applications for permanent residence in South Africa and all were rejected; he made at least six to be allowed to return to Mozambique, all of which were turned down.

Mozambique was then a Province of Portugal and Tsafendas was officially a Portuguese citizen. However, not only was he banned from Mozambique, he was prosecuted and imprisoned in Portugal. The authorities objected to his past political activism in Mozambique and the fact that he was a Communist who opposed the dictatorship of Premier Antonio Salazar. As for drifting around the world, Mozambique and South Africa were the only countries Tsafendas lived in prior to being banned from them, although as a child, he had also lived for a year in Egypt. While serving the Allied cause as a merchant seaman in World War Two, he was stationed in Canada and in the United States. In 1947, he was deported from America to Greece and it was then that his odyssey began. With Mozambique, Portugal and South Africa inaccessible, he tried to find a place to live.⁶³⁵⁴ All these travels were known to the Commission.

The fact is Tsafendas was travelling because he was not allowed to live where he wished to live, in Mozambique and South Africa. "Forced globe-trotting," he called it.⁶³⁵⁵ If one of his visa applications had been successful, he would have gone there immediately. It is true that Tsafendas travelled much more widely than most people, but an analysis of his journeys and intentions comprehensively disproves the Commission's characterization of Tsafendas as a "feckless rolling-stone." He spent the first twenty-three years of his life in Mozambique, Egypt and South Africa. He lived in those countries because that was where his family was. From 1941 to 1947, he lived in the United States or, during the Second World War, at sea serving in American Liberty Ships. In 1947, and against his will, he was deported to Greece because of his Greek origins, although he wanted to return to Mozambique.

While in Greece, he joined the Democratic Army, the military wing of the Greek Communist Party, and fought with them in the civil war. When it was obvious that the Communists had lost and the war was coming to an end, Tsafendas applied for a visa to return to South Africa. In his application he wrote, "I am here a man without a country, living in strange lands with people who have different ways of living, customs and languages."⁶³⁵⁶ The application was turned down. He decided to try Mozambique, via Portugal. He managed to do this by taking ship from Greece to France, then travelling on foot to Portugal through Spain.⁶³⁵⁷

In Portugal, in November 1949, Tsafendas was arrested because the authorities had ⁶³⁵⁴ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁵⁵ Demetrios Tsafendakis Affidavit, November 1965. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen, NASA; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶³⁵⁶ Report of the COE. Chapter II B, Paragraph 17. December 1966. R.P. 16/1967. Pretoria.

⁶³⁵⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

questions about his identity. It was discovered that he was indeed a Portuguese citizen, but had not served his compulsory term in the military and that he had been dismissed twice from jobs in Mozambique for Communist activities.⁶³⁵⁸ Tsafendas spent the next year in prison but was then released and boarded a ship to Mozambique. He arrived there in October 1951 but was refused entry because he was listed in official files as a Communist and suspected of involvement in subversive activities.⁶³⁵⁹ This refusal led to his next twelve years being spent in exile. In January 1952, he was back in Portugal and was arrested in Lisbon. The police discovered that he was a Communist and an avowed anti-colonialist who was under suspicion of “unclear activities” during his time in Mozambique and put him in jail again.⁶³⁶⁰

Upon his eventual release a few months later, with his chosen destinations South Africa and Mozambique unattainable, he decided to go to Sweden, where he had heard he could get a job as a welder. He travelled there through Denmark, and eventually got a job as a carpenter.⁶³⁶¹ He did not stay in Sweden long as the weather was too cold and the money too little, so he moved to Hamburg, Germany and found work as a welder. Tsafendas remained in Germany from early 1954 to June 1955. During his time there, he sent off applications to be allowed to return to Mozambique and to South Africa. All were rejected and in mid-1955 he returned once more to Portugal and spent the next three years working as a hawker in Lisbon.⁶³⁶²

In 1958, Tsafendas travelled to Brussels to sell embroidery at the international exhibition, Expo 58. From there, he went back to Germany and spent the next year and a half in Frankfurt, working for one and half months at Fries and Son, six months for Anglo-American Fashions and Designers, and then another six months at a US Army printing works.⁶³⁶³ During his time in Germany, he lived on his own but had a relationship with a German girl who was a Communist.⁶³⁶⁴

⁶³⁵⁸ PIDE Confidential Report about Demitrio Tsafendas, 7 June 1955. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶³⁵⁹ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Antony Maw statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

⁶³⁶⁰ Diario Popular, 9 September 1966, ‘E conhesido em Lisboa o assassino do Dr. Verwoerd.’

⁶³⁶¹ Ochsensall Hospital report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas, 6 June 1955. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1, Sub-file: 1/8. NASA.

⁶³⁶² Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶³⁶³ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁶⁴ Father Efthimios Eleftheriadis in a personal interview, 27 January 2011.

In May 1959, Tsafendas travelled to Britain, hoping to find a job. He was refused a work permit and took “clandestine” jobs to survive.⁶³⁶⁵ While in London, once again, he applied for permission to enter South Africa, sending a letter and an application form dated August 4, 1959 to the Union’s immigration attaché in London. A note attached to his file at the embassy stated that Tsafendas had sought permanent residence status in South Africa several times without success, that in 1941 he entered illegally and was fined; it said he had Communist leanings and had threatened to enter without permission if he was denied again. The diplomat dealing with the application wrote, “Refusal is suggested!” On September 11, 1959, “Demetrio Tsafandakis, alias Demetrio Tsafendas,” was blacklisted by the South African Department of the Interior, meaning that he could receive no passport or admission facilities without the consent of the Department’s head office.⁶³⁶⁶

In London he also became politically active with anti-apartheid and anti-fascist organisations. He was discovered to be in the country illegally and in December 1959, the British sent him back to Germany, where he spent the next six months working in a tractor factory in Munich.⁶³⁶⁷ In March 1960, he read about the Sharpeville massacre and decided to return to South Africa and “do something” against Dr. Verwoerd and apartheid.⁶³⁶⁸ Convinced by now that he would not be allowed to enter the country legitimately, he decided on an illegal route, “through the African states south to South Africa.” The first stage took him through the Balkan States to Piraeus, Greece, then he took a ferry to Alexandria, Egypt. There his passport expired and he was unable to renew it or replace it, but with the help of the Red Cross, he managed to get to Beirut and Jerusalem.⁶³⁶⁹

With his Africa North-to-South plan blocked, Tsafendas decided to return to Portugal. Travelling through Lebanon and Syria by bus, he crossed the Taurus mountain range and reached Ankara, Turkey in May 1961. A month later, he arrived in Istanbul, where he worked as a teacher of English at the best private language college in Turkey at the time,

⁶³⁶⁵ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶³⁶⁶ Report of the COE. Chapter II B, Paragraphs 28-30. December 1966. R.P. 16/1967. Pretoria.

⁶³⁶⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁶⁸ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶³⁶⁹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

the Limasollu Naci College.⁶³⁷⁰

In December 1961, he left to visit a former comrade from the Greek Civil War who lived in Sofia, Bulgaria. His visit lasted two weeks and then he went to Greece to spend Christmas with his good friend John Michaletos and his family.⁶³⁷¹ In January 1962, he travelled to the island of Crete to meet his relatives and see where his beloved father and his hero great-grandfather were born. From Greece, he travelled to Italy, then took the train to Lisbon, where he arrived in February 1962.⁶³⁷²

Tsafendas worked as a welder in Lisbon until July 1962, when he went back to England and again participated in anti-apartheid and anti-fascist demonstrations. In late 1962, he learned that his father had died and he determined to visit his grave in South Africa. After several more unsuccessful applications for a visa for Mozambique and South Africa, in August or September of 1963, after twelve years of exile, the Portuguese government relented. Convinced by an “act” he put that he was mad but harmless, and “reformed” in terms of his political ideology, the authorities gave him amnesty and permission to return to Mozambique.⁶³⁷³

In October 1963, he arrived in Mozambique and a month later, with the help of his family, he was back in South Africa in Pretoria. He remained in Pretoria until July 1964, working for five months for F.A. Poole Engineering and the rest of the time at his half-sister's café. He crossed into Rhodesia to visit another half-sister he had not seen since 1941, and from there went again to Mozambique. He remained in Beira from October 1964 until November 1964, working for the Hume Pipe Company,⁶³⁷⁴ before being arrested by the Portuguese police for “making subversive propaganda against the Portuguese government and spreading subversive propaganda among the native masses.”⁶³⁷⁵

⁶³⁷⁰ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁷¹ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

⁶³⁷² Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁷³ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶³⁷⁴ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA; South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 12 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶³⁷⁵ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio

After three months in jail in Beira, he left Mozambique for Durban in March 1965. He remained there until October 1965, working off and on as an interpreter at the Durban Court, as a welder at Fraser and Chalmers for two months and for a month for South African Railways. After receiving a letter from a girl who said she wanted to meet and marry him, he travelled from Durban to Cape Town, where he met her. He remained in Cape Town from October 1965 until September 1966.

None of the above travels can be described as aimless. Tsafendas himself, as already mentioned, characterised them in his affidavit as “forced globetrotting”⁶³⁷⁶ and he was right. Several countries happened to be on the way to his destination, like France, Italy, Spain, Syria, Lebanon, Denmark and Turkey. Naturally, he spent little time there because he was just passing through. This does not apply to Turkey, where he got a teaching job and stayed for seven months. He visited Greece for the second time, Rhodesia and Bulgaria for holidays. For business and work, he travelled England, Belgium and Sweden, while one of the Liberty ships during the Second World War also took him to Canada. Apart from places where he stayed only weeks or a few months, this is his life story:

- Six years in Egypt, all in Alexandria (1919-1925).
- Seventeen years in Mozambique: 16 years in Lourenço Marques and one in Beira (1918-1919, 1925-1939, 1963-1964).
- Five years in South Africa: approximately two years in Pretoria, one in Johannesburg, one in Cape Town and a eight months in Durban (1939-1941, 1963-1966, plus school in Middleburg).
- Six years in the USA in Boston and New York, a lot of this time at sea (1941-1947).
- Two years in Greece, all in Athens (1947-1949).
- Six years in Portugal, all in Lisbon (1951-1953, 1955-1958, 1962-1963).
- Three years in Germany, all in three cities, Munich, Frankfurt and Hamburg (1953-1955, 1958-1959).
- Seven months in Turkey in Istanbul (1961).⁶³⁷⁷

This is not drifting, it is the odyssey of a man who was forced to live in exile from the country where he was born (Mozambique) for twelve years, who for sixteen years was not allowed to enter the country where his family lived (South Africa) and who was prosecuted and imprisoned because of his political beliefs in the country of his official nationality and where, after Mozambique, he spent most of his time (Portugal). Wherever he was, he always applied for permission to return to Mozambique and South Africa. Had he been allowed to return to either country or left in peace in Portugal, this vast Baedeker of travel would never have been opened.

Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶³⁷⁶ Demetrios Tsafendakis Affidavit, November 1965. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen, NASA.

⁶³⁷⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

Tsafendas travelled through so many countries mainly for two reasons:

- In search of a better place to stay and work
- He needed to cross through many countries to reach his destination.

Tsafendas's desperate efforts to return to Mozambique or South Africa and find a place to live and work without being followed by the police do not constitute being branded as a "feckless rolling-stone." His peregrinations recall those of Odysseus, who travelled for ten years through many different places to reach his destination. All of these travels and the reasons for them were known to the Commission, therefore to characterise Tsafendas as a feckless rolling-stone was a travesty of the truth.

UNSCRUPULOUS AND SELFISH

To characterize Tsafendas as unscrupulous and selfish is arguably the most unpleasant and the least accurate of all of the Commission's negative pen portraits. Tsafendas, voluntarily and without charge, taught English to children on three different occasions in his life: in Lourenço Marques in the 1930s, in Istanbul in 1961 and in Beira in 1964. He did this because he believed strongly that education was a person's greatest asset and the best way to get out of poverty and become a better and more useful person to society. This is hardly what an unscrupulous and selfish man would do.

Peter Pappas, a Greek café proprietor in Durban, said he would "sometimes gave him (Tsafendas) a free meal, but when he started work he paid me." Pappas also said that Tsafendas was friendly with White "down-and-outs" and when he had some money he would give them a few cents.⁶³⁷⁸ This was not the first time Tsafendas helped poor people, though penniless himself. In Cape Town, he aided his young flatmate, Jacobus Bornman, when he was out of funds, and then declined to take the money back.⁶³⁷⁹ Both of these incidents were known to the Commission, but there was no mention of them in the Report.

⁶³⁷⁸ Rand Daily Mail, 14 September 1966, 'Tsafendas: in the eyes of a friend.'

Tsafendas regularly bought food, sweets and toys for the family of Patrick O’Ryan, who was hosting him. When Patrick complained that this was embarrassing for him since he was the head of the family, Tsafendas’s told the children that it was he and his father who had made the purchases.⁶³⁸⁰ Tsafendas also helped a colleague in Beira to build a room for his daughter, who was to get married.⁶³⁸¹ He worked voluntarily in his half-sister’s cafe in Pretoria for nine months, refusing to take any money, after she had given him a rent-free apartment.⁶³⁸² He sent a “thank you” card to his uncle in Crete after he had stayed in his house for a few days in January 1961.⁶³⁸³ He urged Greek sailors of the Eleni tanker to boycott South Africa’s economy by spending as little money as possible. In order to show them the hardships of apartheid, he took some of these sailors to a township in Cape Town.⁶³⁸⁴ Once again, these are not the actions of an unscrupulous and selfish man.

An unscrupulous and selfish person is by definition someone concerned primarily with his own well-being, no matter how this is achieved. Such a person would never act disinterestedly, in pursuit of what he saw as noble political ends or out of concern for others, sometimes risking life and liberty in the process, as Tsafendas did in the following cases:

- In England, Tsafendas became involved with the anti-fascist and the British anti-apartheid movement and participated in meetings and demonstrations arranged by both movements.⁶³⁸⁵
- He voluntarily joined the Greek Communists in the Greek Civil War to fight for a cause he believed in.⁶³⁸⁶

⁶³⁷⁹ Jacobus Johannes Bornman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁸⁰ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Reuben O’ Ryan in a personal interview, 15 April 2016; Father Ioannis Tsaftaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶³⁸¹ Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015.

⁶³⁸² Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015.

⁶³⁸³ Aris Tsafantakis in a personal interview, 13 April 2016.

⁶³⁸⁴ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 15 February 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶³⁸⁵ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA; Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶³⁸⁶ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 15 February 2014; Georgios

- In Mozambique, he protested against Portugal's forced cotton policy and later toured villages preaching about Communism and working for the independence of Mozambique, although he knew he could be arrested. When he was eventually detained and accused of pretending to be a Christian missionary while in reality preaching "under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique's independence,"⁶³⁸⁷ he told the police that what he wanted was "a Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they white or black, and therefore separated from the Mother-nation."⁶³⁸⁸

Finally, a selfish and unscrupulous man would never have committed the ultimate act of assassination, knowing that there was no escape for him and that his life would very probably end soon as a result. This is conclusive proof of Tsafendas unselfishness. His conviction that he was doing the right thing and that a "change of policy would take place" after the assassination were enough for him to act as he did.

TSAFENDAS PRESENTED AS A BEGGAR

*Tsafendas was always begging for a place to sleep and for meals. At Beira, for example, he slept at the fire-station for a time.*⁶³⁸⁹

The above statement is one of the clearest indications of the Commission's effort to belittle and humiliate Tsafendas. Although it is true that Tsafendas slept at the fire-station in Beira at one point, the rest of the statement is completely inaccurate. The usage of the word "beg" is completely inaccurate and harsh. The circumstances of Tsafendas when he slept in the fire-station are also not mentioned, although known to the Commission and very important.

Tsafendas was released from prison in Beira, having spent three months there, on January 26, 1965.⁶³⁹⁰ Penniless and without a place to stay, he had two options: to find Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015. Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶³⁸⁷ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015.

⁶³⁸⁸ PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 8 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶³⁸⁹ Chapter III C, Paragraph 20.

⁶³⁹⁰ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA; Chapter II C, Paragraph 19.

himself somewhere to sleep and stay until he stabilize his situation or to ask for help from his friends. Obviously embarrassed to ask his friends' for help, also maybe thinking that he might put them into a difficult and uncomfortable situation since he was just released from prison, he chose to not go to one of them. Instead, he went to the fire-station and asked the fire-fighters if he could sleep in the department's premises and they agreed and eventually spent ten nights there.⁶³⁹¹ No one else told the police and the Commission from the statements found at the archives that Tsafendas "begged" or even asked for a place to sleep. This is the only case, so to use the word "always" is entirely inaccurate. Furthermore, probably a lot of people would have done the same in Tsafendas's condition.

Two more witnesses, George Ananiades and George Liberopoulos, stated to the police something that is compatible with the Commission's report. Lt.-Colonel van Wyk wrote in his report after he had questioned both that Tsafendas "practically forced himself upon them and they treated him and often paid for his meals but further had nothing to do with him. He never spoke about politics with them. They describe him as a normal person with a very high-intelligence."⁶³⁹²

Furthermore, John Verghis, the owner of a café in Beira which Tsafendas often visited, testified to the police that Tsafendas "frequently visited the cafe where he spent time in the company of other Greeks. The subject was quiet and never spoke much and never about politics. It seemed to him that the subject always visited the café to see just if someone would give him something to eat or drink. ... According to him Tsafendas was a normal person."⁶³⁹³ John Galanakis was given by Tsafendas when he later entered his shop the impression that he "was on the scrounge, but realised that he was an intelligent man and that he spoke Greek, Portuguese and Afrikaans fluently."⁶³⁹⁴

All the above statements were given to Lt.-Colonel van Wyk of the South African police when he visited Mozambique. He concluded in his report that Tsafendas "was most of the time without money and took advantage of others." This seems to be in line with what Lt.-Colonel van Wyk was told. However, it is noticeable that these statements and opinions ⁶³⁹¹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

⁶³⁹² South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶³⁹³ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶³⁹⁴ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

came only from people who knew Tsafendas in Mozambique and especially in Beira, at a time when he was finding it difficult to make ends meet. A closer look at Tsafendas's problems in Mozambique throws some light on his behaviour and attitudes there. He was arrested twice, he spent three months in police custody and he had difficulty finding work. That he was pressed for cash is evident from the fact that he asked Nick Vlachopoulos, his brother-in-law in Pretoria, to sell some furniture that he had left in storage there.

Vlachopoulos did so and sent the proceeds to Tsafendas in Mozambique. It is unlikely that Tsafendas would have sold his furniture unless he was in a serious financial situation. If he just wanted to get rid of the furniture, he could have sold it himself before he left Pretoria.

In total, the police and the Commission questioned some two hundred witnesses and only the Beira interviewees commented along those lines. None of the witnesses in South Africa or elsewhere in Mozambique and Rhodesia confirmed this picture of Tsafendas; indeed, some, like Bornman and Pappas, testified that Tsafendas was the exact opposite and helped people financially, although he was poor himself. However, even in Beira, things were not exactly like this.

Andreas Babiolakis, Costas Poriassis and Nick Papadakis, who knew Verghis well and often visited his café, disagree with Verghis's assumption that Tsafendas visited the café "just to see if someone would give him something to eat or drink." Certainly, Greeks often offered to buy drinks for Tsafendas and for each other, but this was customary when the Greeks sat together. If a new person arrived and was invited to join their company, someone would buy his drink. According to Andreas Babiolakis and Nick Papadakis who were present in Beira at the time, however, Tsafendas would only accept if he had enough money to buy the next round. Most times, he could not afford to buy everyone a drink, so he would decline their offer, but he would sit in their company and talk and listen.⁶³⁹⁵

Ananiades and Liberopoulos stated to the author that they strongly disagree with van Wyk's interpretation of their words with regards to Tsafendas forcing himself upon them and strongly condemn the use of the word "begging" which they state that it is a lie. Ananiades disagrees with the report's comment that Tsafendas "practically forced himself upon them" and believes it is "inaccurate." He told the author that Tsafendas "was not the kind of man" described by the Commission. He states that if the Commission based the conclusion in question in his statement to the police, that it is mistaken as this is not what he had meant. He told the author:

⁶³⁹⁵ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Costas Poriassis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

“No, no, no, no. It was nothing like that. I met him one day in Costa do Sol where we had coffee. We spoke and he said he was leaving the next day for South Africa. That was all. He never asked me to pay anything for him or to give him any money. Nothing. Never. I can't say if he generally was a beggar, but he was not like that with me and did not give me any such impression. He did not look or act like a beggar. It is not true [that Tsafendas forced himself upon him]. I don't know why it is in my statement, but I never said anything like that.”⁶³⁹⁶

Liberopoulos associated often with Tsafendas and considered him to be a very “intelligent and political person.” He does not remember what he told the police, but he too disagrees that Tsafendas “forced himself upon them” which finds to be “not true.” When he first met Tsafendas, he had paid for his dinner because it was Greek tradition for the people who lived there to pay for a visitor's dinner, although Tsafendas was reluctant to allow him to do so. The next day, Liberopoulos attempted to pay again, but Tsafendas refused and paid for both of them. Liberopoulos characterises Tsafendas as a “proud man” and “no beggar.” He told the author:

“He never took advantage of me or of anyone I knew. He would come and sit with us but would never accept a drink if he could not afford to buy you one in return. He would make excuses to avoid accepting the drink, and would never admit that it was because he could not afford the next round.”

Liberopoulos had also tried to distance himself from Tsafendas during the questioning.⁶³⁹⁷ Evidence of egregious omission and distortion by the Commission concerns the case of a twenty-escudos loan. It was known to the Commission that John Emmanuel Marvis lent Tsafendas twenty escudos, which he paid back a few days later.⁶³⁹⁸ This incident is omitted. However, what the Commission does mention, in Chapter II C, Paragraph 21, is that “on one occasion, he (Tsafendas) was seen with a wad of hundred-escudo notes.” The person who ⁶³⁹⁶ George Ananiades in a personal interview, 21 June 2016.

⁶³⁹⁷ George Liberopoulos in a personal interview, 6 July 2015.

⁶³⁹⁸ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

made this statement was Marvis, but what the Commission omitted was that Marvis had seen the money when Tsafendas paid him back. Obviously, to have carried the full Marvis story would have contradicted the Commission's preferred picture of Tsafendas begging for meals and a place to stay. Tsafendas also was given money to sail from Beira to Durban by Costas Poriazis, and Giangos and Andreas Babiolakis, but he paid all of them back about a month later.⁶³⁹⁹

There were several known occasions when Tsafendas acted with generosity towards poor people although he was poor himself. While the Commission mentioned that he was a beggar, it failed to include any of the evidence of his generosity. Jacobus Bornman was Tsafendas's flatmate for two months in Cape Town. When he was broke, Tsafendas voluntarily gave him five cents and when Bornman tried to return the money, Tsafendas refused to take it back.⁶⁴⁰⁰ The Commission's report refers to Bornman but not this statement of his. Peter Pappas, owner of a Greek café in Durban, said when Tsafendas had some money he would give "a few cents to the white down-and-outs of the city." Pappas said also had said, "When his luck was out, I sometimes gave him a free meal, but when he started work he paid me."⁶⁴⁰¹

Furthermore, Richard Poggenpoel testified to the police and the Commission that when Tsafendas stayed in his house for two weeks, he did not pay for lodging because he was unemployed. However, a few weeks later and after he had moved out of his house, Tsafendas visited Poggenpoel and gave him R4. Poggenpoel did not want to take the money, which he had not asked for, but Tsafendas insisted on paying him.⁶⁴⁰² All this was known to the Commission but was left out of its Report, presumably because they were not the things a beggar would do and therefore contradicted such a claim.

The author asked forty-four witnesses whether Tsafendas could be described as a beggar and not one agreed. For reasons of space and since the witnesses' statements about his character are listed in the previous chapter, such statements will not be listed here, but the following are some examples of views as to whether he was a beggar:

⁶³⁹⁹ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Costas Poriazis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

⁶⁴⁰⁰ Jacobus Johannes Borman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁰¹ Rand Daily Mail, 14 September 1966, 'Tsafendas: in the eyes of a friend.'

⁶⁴⁰² Richard Poggenpoel statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA; Richard Poggenpoel in a personal interview, 30 July 2013.

One evening in August 1966, some of the Eleni seamen asked Tsafendas to take them to a Greek restaurant. He did so and despite their protests, he paid the bill for everybody. Tsafendas said the crew were “strangers in his town” and since he was the host, he should pay.⁶⁴⁰³ Patrick O’Ryan and his son Reuben O’Ryan in whose house Tsafendas lived for five months said that he constantly bought food and sweets and toys for their family. When Patrick complained that it was embarrassing for him to be seen that their guest was bringing more food and toys in his house than him, Tsafendas did not stop, but started claiming to the children that it was their dad who had bought it and not him.⁶⁴⁰⁴

Emanuel Tsabouniaris, one of the Eleni seamen, told the author that he gave Tsafendas money to buy him a few things ashore and when he returned with them, he told Tsafendas to keep the change. Tsafendas insisted that he take back the change. Tsabouniaris said, “He was always very prompt with our financial dealings.” Tsabouniaris also said that “the only thing I found strange was that his profession of a hawker did not match his character. He was very educated and very polite for a hawker. The thing that impressed me more was that he was very proud. He was doing the job with pride, not like a beggar or trying to make you buy in a sleazy way. He was a true gentleman.”⁶⁴⁰⁵

Father Nikola Banovic became very sad upon hearing that the Commission had presented Tsafendas as a beggar, and found it hard to believe it. He told the author, “Dimitris was a very generous man. If he had two drachmas (Greek currency of the time) in his pocket, he would give them both to someone in need. He was not a beggar, this is libel... I remember he always used to give good tips to waiters and taxi drivers.”⁶⁴⁰⁶

THE MISSING BIBLE

*However, he remained at the hostel until 14th April, 1965, and when he left he took the Bible that was in his room with him.*⁶⁴⁰⁷

The above statement refers to the time when Tsafendas lived at the E.R. Carney Hostel, Clair Wood, while working for the South African Railways and Harbours. The ⁶⁴⁰³ Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 15 February 2014; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁴⁰⁴ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Reuben O’ Ryan in a personal interview, 15 April 2016; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶⁴⁰⁵ Emanuil Tsabouniaris in personal interview with the author, 14 June 2016.

⁶⁴⁰⁶ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

⁶⁴⁰⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 26.

statement is by Casper Andries Willemse, the hostel's housemaster, and it is correct.⁶⁴⁰⁸ But once again a positive comment about Tsafendas is omitted since Willemse, had also characterised Tsafendas as "a sophisticated, friendly and well-spoken man."⁶⁴⁰⁹

TSAFENDAS'S CHARACTER ACCORDING TO PEOPLE WHO MET HIM AND TESTIFIED TO THE COE OR TO THE POLICE

Let us now consider what Tsafendas's friends and close acquaintances said about him in the period leading up to the assassination. All of the statements below were in the possession of the Commission and were omitted from its Report. The study includes here only their comments about Tsafendas's character and not his political ideas or his mental state as these are discussed in the relevant sections of this chapter:

1. Kenneth Heugh Ross, Tsafendas's landlord for two months: "Tsafendas was very fond of discussing politics and gave me the opinion that he was well versed in politics. Tsafendas objected to the Communists being banished to Robin Island because of their political opinions and actions. In general, Tsafendas opposed to every decision taken by the South African Government and freely voiced his opinion to me. He was blatantly opposed to the National Party policy, the policy of the present Government, and was definitely pre-Russian. I am aware that Tsafendas possessed a large quantity of literature but did not take note of the names of the books he read."⁶⁴¹⁰
2. Johannes Aurets, Tsafendas's supervisor at South African Railways, told the police that Tsafendas "was a well-mannered and well-spoken person. He associated with those working with him. He was soft-spoken and appeared to be of a good nature. During the time he was employed under my supervision, i.e. for approximately three weeks, I did not see him being cross at any time. He was a good worker."⁶⁴¹¹
3. August Oestrich worked with Tsafendas for five months at F.A. Poole in Pretoria. He found him to be "very polite, fairly intelligent, well-spoken in both English and German, ⁶⁴⁰⁸ Casper Andries Willemse statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁰⁹ Sunday Times, 11 September 1966: 1, 8, 'Assassin-man with a chip on his shoulder.'

⁶⁴¹⁰ Kenneth Heugh Ross statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴¹¹ Johannes Jaonus Uys Aurets statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

very courteous and quiet.”⁶⁴¹²

4. Patrick O’Ryan hosted Tsafendas in his home for five months in 1965-1966 and was close to him up to his arrest. Tsafendas was described to him by a preacher of the Christian Church as a “highly cultured gentleman, a very refined gentleman who speaks seven languages.”⁶⁴¹³ He formed a “deep liking”⁶⁴¹⁴ for Tsafendas and considered him to be an “enlightened person.”⁶⁴¹⁵ He also testified that “I had confidence in him and used to like him. He was a very kindly man. In my experience of him he had a good heart... I never got the impression that something was wrong in his mind,” or that he “was mentally disturbed.”⁶⁴¹⁶ He also found Tsafendas to be “well-spoken and had good vocabulary.”⁶⁴¹⁷
5. Inspector Horacio Ferreira of the Portuguese Security Police was in charge of the cells where Tsafendas was held in custody in Beira in 1964. His statement to the police said he considered Tsafendas to be “normal and regarded him as a very intelligent person.”⁶⁴¹⁸
6. Ian Boswell, administrative assistant at the Department of Labour in Cape Town. He interviewed Tsafendas three times in 1966 and testified that “he was at all times neatly dressed and never gave the impression of being destitute. Aside from being over-talkative, he showed no symptoms of abnormality, during his interviews with me.”⁶⁴¹⁹
7. John Bornman lived with Tsafendas for six-seven weeks in April and May of 1966. He found Tsafendas to be “normal, intelligent and friendly. He was neat in his person, but his eating habits were messy.” Jacobus Bornman also testified that when he was broke, Tsafendas lent him five cents and when Bornman tried to return the money, Tsafendas refused to take it back. Furthermore Bornman testified that Tsafendas “stood up a lot for the Coloureds.”⁶⁴²⁰ The Commission’s report refers to Bornman but none of the above is included.

⁶⁴¹² August Karel Oestrich statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁴¹³ Patrick O’ Ryan in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes.

⁶⁴¹⁴ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁴¹⁵ Patrick O’ Ryan in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes.

⁶⁴¹⁶ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁴¹⁷ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁴¹⁸ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴¹⁹ Ian James Murdock Boswell statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64. NASA.

⁶⁴²⁰ Jacobus Johannes Borman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA

8. Ralph Lighton, who worked with Tsafendas for nine to ten weeks at the Marine Diamond Corporation, testified to the police that he “never got the slightest impression that he was mentally unsound. He had excellent reasoning powers.”⁶⁴²¹
9. Captain P.A. Sanianos, the Greek Consul in Beira “was often in the company of the subject and others had several conversations with him. He considered Tsafendas to be “a normal and very intelligent person.”⁶⁴²²
10. Cornelius Rudolph, the head court interpreter on the staff of the Magistrate of Durban, accepted Tsafendas as a Portuguese and Greek interpreter. Rudolph used him “on several occasions” over six months and “got to know him pretty well.” He said, “I spoke with him several times, he seemed to be a normal person and intelligent. He spoke English properly.”⁶⁴²³
11. Violet Irene Manning was Tsafendas’s landlady for almost two months in 1965. She told the Commission of Enquiry: “it was a serviced room but I found him making his own bed. When he came to me he was well-dressed, well-spoken, and gave a good impression. From his general appearance he appeared to be a businessman. When he paid me, he had a bundle of notes and I took him to be a man of means.”⁶⁴²⁴
12. Carel van Heerden was senior security officer for the Marine Diamond Corporation and worked with Tsafendas for around three months in 1966. He told the police: “We were transferred from the Marina on a small outboard boat to the Col pontoon. It was terrible, rough seas, so much so that almost all of us old hands got seasick. It struck me that Tsafendas adapted well. He was one of the few who was not seasick. Upon landing, he filled the mess basin on the lower deck with water and started shaving. His calm way struck me that he must know the sea. Tsafendas was employed as a pump, or engineer, operator and did not work under my direct supervision. I introduced myself to him and talked to him. He was friendly, outgoing, and not aloof. I noticed that his eating was messy. Otherwise he was completely normal.”⁶⁴²⁵

⁶⁴²¹ Ralph Lighton statement to the police, 17 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴²² South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴²³ Cornelius Johannes Rudolph statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴²⁴ Violet Irene Manning statement to the COE, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse polisie. NASA.

⁶⁴²⁵ Carel Sebastiaan van Heerden statement to the police, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

13. Neville Judson worked with Tsafendas for Mike's Outfitters for forty-two days in July and August 1966, frequently driving him to the tanker Eleni while it was docked in Cape Town. Of Tsafendas, he told the police that he "never in no way got the impression that he could be mentally deranged. He appeared to be a normal man with normal reasoning powers."⁶⁴²⁶
14. Gillian Claire Lieberman was a personnel secretary at Marine Diamond Corporation who was often visited by Tsafendas in her office. She "found him intelligent, someone apparently able to reason in conversation, but a strange type of person, a unique character. I got the impression that he was physically different in dress and appearance. He was a big man, with a particularly striking big hat, stainless steel teeth, sloppy, dirty clothing."⁶⁴²⁷
15. Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys, employment officer at the Department of Labour in Cape Town, interviewed Tsafendas twice. He testified to the police that Tsafendas was "neatly dressed" and he "never got the impression that there was mentally anything wrong with him or that he acted abnormally."⁶⁴²⁸
16. John Galanakis was given by Tsafendas when the later entered his shop the impression that he "was on the scrounge, but realised that he was an intelligent man and that he spoke Greek, Portuguese and Afrikaans fluently."⁶⁴²⁹
17. Albert Vercueil, Tsafendas's boss at F. A. Poole in Pretoria, said that in the five months he worked with Tsafendas, he found him to be "not a very good worker, but will say that he was an intelligent worker."⁶⁴³⁰ He also testified to the Commission of Enquiry that he considered Tsafendas to be "an intelligent man, just untidy and lazy in rounding off his work." He never got the impression that Mr. Tsafendas was not right in his mind.⁶⁴³¹
18. Helen Grispos knew Tsafendas from birth and grew up with him, while her husband was Tsafendas's best childhood friend. She told the police that Tsafendas was "well-mannered

⁶⁴²⁶ Neville Judson statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die 'Eleni.' NASA.

⁶⁴²⁷ Gillian Claire Liebermann statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴²⁸ Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 1, Sub File: 1/1, Department of Labour. NASA.

⁶⁴²⁹ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴³⁰ Albert Vercueil statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁴³¹ Albert Vercueil statement to the COE, 25 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

and intelligent.”⁶⁴³² She also told the author that she never thought Tsafendas was insane. “He never did or said anything to make me or George (her husband) think that he was insane.”⁶⁴³³

19. Reginald Maile, guard on the Eleni, testified that Tsafendas was “on very friendly relations with the crew... He was sober, polite and perfectly normal.”⁶⁴³⁴
20. Robert Smith, Tsafendas's landlord for two months: “Tsafendas was in my opinion a fanatic on politics and seldomly spoke of anything else... I am also aware that he has a large quantity of literature but do not know the nature thereof.”⁶⁴³⁵
21. Sydney Wiehand, Tsafendas's colleague at the House of Assembly testified that Tsafendas “was a quiet man. He wasn't the rough type or anything like that. He was quiet, quietly spoken, well-mannered.”⁶⁴³⁶
22. Hendrik van Loggenberg knew Tsafendas and his family well in Pretoria. He told the police that Tsafendas “definitely came across as normal ... he also seemed healthy ...”⁶⁴³⁷
23. John Gianouris, the Greek Vice Consul at Lourenço Marques, described Tsafendas as “a normal and intelligent person.”⁶⁴³⁸
24. Petrus Schuin, the head messenger at the Parliament, was also one of the three men who had interviewed him and appointed him. He told the Commission of Enquiry that “there was nothing out of the ordinary about him. Tsafendas was the same as any other person that had worked there.”⁶⁴³⁹
25. Sydney Wiehand, a messenger who was also on the interview panel in the House of Assembly, said Tsafendas “was a quiet man. He wasn't the rough type or anything like that. He was quiet, quietly spoken, well-mannered.”⁶⁴⁴⁰
26. Elizabeth Groves was Tsafendas's landlady for six or seven weeks and a retired

⁶⁴³² Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴³³ Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013.

⁶⁴³⁴ Reginald Robert Maile statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die 'Eleni.' NASA.

⁶⁴³⁵ Robert Harpur Smith statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴³⁶ Sydney William Wiehand testimony to the COE, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

⁶⁴³⁷ Hendrik Johannes van Loggenberg statement to the police, 8 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴³⁸ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴³⁹ Petrus Robert Samuel Schuin testimony to the COE, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴⁰ Sydney William Wiehand testimony to the COE, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

- psychiatric nurse. About Tsafendas she said, "I received complaints that he was argumentative and towards me he said that we Afrikaners are a backward nation. It was clear that he had nothing good towards Afrikaners."⁶⁴⁴¹
27. John Galanakis, who met Tsafendas in Umtali in 1964, told police that he found Tsafendas to be "an intelligent person."⁶⁴⁴²
28. Lt.-Colonel P.J.B. van Wyk wrote in his report from Mozambique that Tsafendas, "for all purposes, can be seen as a normal, intelligent person."⁶⁴⁴³
29. Jose Lopez Baltazar, a fireman in Beira, testified that "when Tsafendas was in the presence of Whites, he said little or nothing, but was friendly and talkative with the Bantu."⁶⁴⁴⁴
30. Owen Smorenberg, who worked with him for five-six weeks, testified that "Tsafendas was very talkative and gave the impression that he was very friendly. He wanted to talk to everybody and it became known to me that he was able to speak different languages."⁶⁴⁴⁵
31. Keith Martincich who worked with him at the Marine Diamond Corporation testified that Tsafendas "spoke to me every day and I got the impression that he was sociable type."⁶⁴⁴⁶
32. William Mare Volbrecht, Tsafendas's school mate at the English Medium Primary School in Middleburg, testified to the police that he was "never a loner and freely mingled with us."⁶⁴⁴⁷
33. Redvers Quintin Wakfer, who worked with Tsafendas at the Power Station in Cape Town, testified that Tsafendas was "neatly dressed."⁶⁴⁴⁸
34. Edward Furness testified that Tsafendas "was well-dressed and appeared to be ⁶⁴⁴¹ Elizabeth Magdalene Groves statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴² Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴³ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴⁴ Col. van Wyk's report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴⁵ Owen Smorenburg statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Leer W.D. 10/10/ 4102 oor Stafendas. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴⁶ Keith Terrence Bertram Martincich statement to the police, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁴⁷ William Mare Volbrecht statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Verklaring deur Majdor Venter. NASA.

⁶⁴⁴⁸ Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 1, Sub File: 1/1, Department of Labour. NASA; Redvers Quintin Wakfer statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub File: 1/5, Subject Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

wealthy.”⁶⁴⁴⁹

35. Katerina Pnema, his half-sister, testified that Tsafendas “was well-dressed and gave a good appearance” although as far as she could see he had no visible means of support.⁶⁴⁵⁰
36. Garnet Muller, Tsafendas’s supervisor at South African Railways for three weeks, testified that Tsafendas gave him to understand that he took the job on a temporary basis. He “observed Demitrio Tsafendas to possess intelligence above that of the average person who is likely to accept a position with the little responsibility which is attached to that of shed attendant.”⁶⁴⁵¹
37. Kyriakos Skordis who Tsafendas used to visit at his coffee shop in Durban for several months in 1965, testified that he “appeared to be quite normal and was apparently in a poor financial position.”⁶⁴⁵²
38. Richard Poggenpoel lived with him for two weeks and kept on associating up to his arrest, “there was no mention or impression that he was mentally abnormal. He lived a completely normal life.”⁶⁴⁵³
39. George Ananiades met Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques in 1963 and described him in his statement to the police “as a normal person with a very high-intelligence.”⁶⁴⁵⁴
40. Helen Daniels told the police: “besides his messy ways, I did not notice anything abnormal about him. There was never any indication that he was mentally abnormal. His stories about travelling abroad was interesting.”⁶⁴⁵⁵
41. Costas Michaletos,⁶⁴⁵⁶ who knew Tsafendas from birth, stated, “Ever since I knew Dimetrios Tsafantakis, I never, any time observed that he showed any deviations. He also never was an aggressive type person.”⁶⁴⁵⁷

⁶⁴⁴⁹ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵⁰ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴⁵¹ Garnet Vincent Muller statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵² Kyriakos Skordis statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵³ Richard Poggenpoel statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵⁴ Col. van Wyk’s report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴⁵⁵ Helen Dorothy Daniels statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵⁶ The correct spelling is Michaletos, not Michaeletos. Costas Michaeletos statement to the police, 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵⁷ Costas Michaeletos statement to the police, 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

42. James Summers, owner of the “Barlings Tea Lounge,” which Tsafendas frequented for four months, testified that Tsafendas “was no nuisance, and appeared to be a quite normal, innocent type. I never had reason to even suspect that he could be mentally unbalanced. He acted quite normal.”⁶⁴⁵⁸
43. George Liberopoulos met Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques in 1963 and described him in his statement to the police as “a normal person with a very high-intelligence.”⁶⁴⁵⁹
44. Gideon Cloete, an employee in the Department of Labour, met Tsafendas twice and said he “seemed eager to get employment, was neatly dressed and had a clean appearance.” Cloete said he saw no signs of abnormality, that “he seemed perfectly normal.”⁶⁴⁶⁰

In addition, we should remember statements which people made to newspapers about Tsafendas which were in the Commission's possession:

1. Dr. Samuel Schmahmann, a classmate, recalled Dimitri as “a popular boy and not the least introverted. I particularly remember him singing a Greek song at a school concert,” he said. “He was very funny and had us all in stitches.”⁶⁴⁶¹
2. Guenther Haafe, doorman at the Frankfurt factory where Tsafendas worked for six weeks in 1958. Eight years later, after the assassination, he still remembered the jovial greeting which Tsafendas gave him every morning. “He was a jolly man, always smiling and friendly. He would almost always come into my locker (room) to say Hi. He was really one of the friendliest workers I have met and trust me, in my twelve years as a doorman I have seen thousands and thousands of faces coming in and out; this man was courteous, they do not make them like that anymore.”⁶⁴⁶²
3. Peter Pappas, owner of a Greek café in Durban, said when Tsafendas had some money he would give “a few cents to the white down-and-outs of the city.” Pappas said also had said, “When his luck was out, I sometimes gave him a free meal, but when he started work he paid me.”⁶⁴⁶³
4. Horst Hartmann, Tsafendas's employer in Frankfurt, Germany, at the heavy engineering ⁶⁴⁵⁸ Herbert James Summers statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁵⁹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁴⁶⁰ Gideon Jacobus Cloete testimony at Tsafendas's summary trial, 19 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, NASA.

⁶⁴⁶¹ Rand Daily Mail, September 8, 1966, ‘Boyhood days of Tsafendas.’

⁶⁴⁶² The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, ‘Tsafendas seen as ‘mystery man’; Natal Witness, 10 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas was so friendly ...’; O Primeiro de Janeiro, 8 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas trabalhou como soldador em Frankforte.’

⁶⁴⁶³ Rand Daily Mail, 14 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas: in the eyes of a friend.’

company Fries and Son, characterised Tsafendas “as extremely nice and friendly ... He looked like a successful business man. I thought he was more likely to apply for an executive job than as a welder. Well-dressed and well-mannered, he was extremely courteous, a very pleasant man...he made a good impression and he spoke good German, so I took him on...” Tsafendas “left on his own wish,” although Hartmann “would have liked to keep him.”⁶⁴⁶⁴

5. J. Willemse, a former landlord, characterised Tsafendas as a “sophisticated, friendly and well-spoken man.”⁶⁴⁶⁵

Do these forty-nine people describe the same man as that set forth by the Commission? All of their comments, were in the possession of the Commission but not one was used in its Report. Tsafendas is described by these men and women as an intelligent, polite, talkative, sociable and friendly person, perfectly able to reason in conversation, well-dressed and courteous. The Commission seemed to base its description of Tsafendas on a figment of Judge van Wyk's imagination, created with only one intention, which is to belittle Tsafendas in the eyes of the public.

CONCLUSION

The Commission's Report is a travesty of the truth, picking and choosing witnesses, using and ignoring their statements to create a Tsafendas who never existed. The statistics tell the story and are worth repeating: Of the two hundred witnesses who were interviewed by the police and the Commission, 44 made positive statements about Tsafendas's character, and 6 negative, with the remainder neutral. Thus, 22% of the statements were positive, 3% were negative and the remaining 75% neutral. However, the Commission used only 1 of the 44 positive statements, thus the 2.2%, in comparison to 100% of the negative ones. Could anything better demonstrate the Commission's bias and aim? The forty-four positive statements about Tsafendas, along with the five more listed above, contradict not only the Commission's caricature of him, but also the picture of him that emerged during the summary trial. Tsafendas was stated there to be withdrawn, isolated, unsociable, unfriendly, unable to function on a reasonable level, unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, a man who suffered from thought-disorder and was unable to speak properly.

⁶⁴⁶⁴ Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, 'He made a good impression'; Natal Witness, 10 September 1966, 'Tsafendas was so friendly ...'; O Primeiro de Janeiro, 8 September 1966, 'Tsafendas trabalhou como soldador em Frankforte.'

⁶⁴⁶⁵ Sunday Times, 11 September 1966: 1, 8. 'Assassin-man with a chip on his shoulder.'

Furthermore, the Commission manipulated witnesses' testimonies and other evidence to mispresent Tsafendas and some situations to his disadvantage. It also used negative characterisations of him for which there was no support. It seems obvious that the Commission's intention was not to reveal the real Tsafendas, but to create a distorted version of him, which would arouse the public's contempt and thus ensure that no-one would ever think of him as a hero or attribute a political motive to his act.

TSAFENDAS'S MENTAL STATE

The Report contains some comments made about the mental state of Tsafendas by people who knew him. In this section we will examine what the Commission has included and what it has omitted.

TSAFENDAS'S FAMILY'S OPINION ABOUT HIS MENTAL STATE

*They (the family) realized that he was eccentric, but did not think he was mentally disordered. The half-sister who lives in Rhodesia stated that the family did realize that he was not quite normal after he returned from Portugal. He said nothing to them about his alleged worm.*⁶⁴⁶⁶

The Commission states that Tsafendas's family "realized that he was eccentric, but did not think he was mentally disordered." This is accurate, but the family had made a much stronger statement regarding his mental state. They told the Commission clearly that Tsafendas "was definitely not insane."⁶⁴⁶⁷

The Commission also states that his half-sister in Rhodesia, Katerina Pnefma, stated that "the family did realize that he was not quite normal after he returned from Portugal." Her statement contradicts the view of other family members that "he was definitely not insane." Furthermore, the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali who had interviewed Pnefma when she made this comment, added at the bottom of the report that "At the time of the interview, Mrs. Pnefma was considerably upset and her opinion and facts might be slightly biased and inaccurate."⁶⁴⁶⁸ Clearly the Commission ignored this caveat.

Furthermore, Pnefma stated in a personal interview with the author:

"Of course I was upset! He [Tsafendas] had ruined my life. I knew he had the moment I heard about it [the assassination]. I remember it as if it was yesterday. I was by myself in the house ... no, they [the policemen] didn't have a typing machine; they were keeping notes ... I don't remember saying that he was unbalanced, but he certainly was not ... no it is untrue that we thought he was unbalanced. He was perfectly sane. He was very clever, cleverer than any of us [the family]. I must have meant that he had crazy political ideas. I don't remember saying that at all... I remember saying that he was talking rubbish! He was always talking rubbish, but I couldn't tell the police what exactly he was saying! He was saying that the South Africans are Nazis, he was calling Dr. Verwoerd Hitler's best student ... that us and most Whites were exploiting the Black Rhodesians ... he was calling the Greeks racists, saying that one day the Rhodesians would kick us all out and take back what we stole from them ... that one day the Blacks in South Africa would throw the Whites into the sea ... He believed Mozambique and South Africa should have a colourful flag, like a rainbow or something in order for each colour to represent each race! Have you heard anything more absurd? He used to say that Jesus Christ was socialist and if he was alive today he would have been a revolutionary fighting apartheid and for the independence of Mozambique! Can you believe it? Well, this is what he was saying, all this kind of nonsense! How could I have told all these things to the police? They would have said 'Why didn't you report him to the police since he had such crazy ideas? Didn't you know he was dangerous?'

⁶⁴⁶⁶ Chapter II C, Paragraph 6.

⁶⁴⁶⁷ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁴⁶⁸ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

You can't imagine how many people had told my poor father to do something with him and his crazy political ideas. You can't imagine how many! Even my poor mother told him to talk to him because he would get us into trouble someday, as he was often doing, but my dad did nothing. It was actually all his fault. He taught him all these things, but my father was a cautious man, he was not like Dimitri; he wouldn't go around saying all these stupidities. His son was the opposite; he couldn't keep his mouth shut ... what about the other thing? He changed his name because he thought it was insulting to be called Tsafantakis since this was the name given to our ancestors by the Turks! Wasn't this nonsense?"⁶⁴⁶⁹

Despite the frailty of the evidence it adduced, the Commission apparently felt it could not omit the opinions of Tsafendas's family about his mental condition since this was something everyone would have wondered about.

⁶⁴⁶⁹ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

NEGATIVE STATEMENTS REGARDING TSAFENDAS'S MENTAL STATE IN THE COMMISSION'S REPORT

Let us now examine those parts of the Report where people spoke negatively about Tsafendas's mental state:

Wilhelmina de Vos

*She says that at times his conversation was confused and her impression was that he was mad.*⁶⁴⁷⁰

De Vos was Tsafendas's landlady for about a month. We must assumed that she made this comment above to the Commission, because she gave a completely different statement to the police two weeks before the trial began, saying that she "considered him to be a completely normal person."⁶⁴⁷¹ De Vos's testimony to the Commission has gone missing, so the author cannot know when she gave evidence. It is possible that she did so after or during the summary trial as this could explain her change of opinion. Perhaps influenced by what she heard in the court, she changed her mind; perhaps she felt overawed by those learned psychiatrists who testified that Tsafendas was mad. We do not know whether the Commission asked her why she changed her mind. What we do know is that the Commission ignored the statement she made to the police on October 3 and included her new testimony. Without knowing the background of the new testimony, it would be imprudent for the author to speculate further. However, the fact is that before the trial de Vos gave an entirely different statement to the police saying Tsafendas was a completely normal person.

James Johnston

*Mr. Johnston, a minister of his church, gained the impression that he was slightly unbalanced.*⁶⁴⁷²

This fifteen-word sentence at the end of a short paragraph about Tsafendas's religious practices demonstrates an extraordinary distortion by omission and a very clear attempt by the Commission to manipulate a witness's words to Tsafendas's disadvantage. Johnston was ⁶⁴⁷⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 65.

⁶⁴⁷¹ Wilhelmina Sophia de Vos statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁷² Chapter II C, Paragraph 42.

a defence witness and testified in the summary trial. His case was examined there, but we will discuss it again here in the context of the Commission's statement.

Johnston told the police on October 6 that he had "only seen Tsafendas periodically and had no discussions with him ... I do not know Tsafendas very well and the longest discussion I had with him was for about 10 minutes at each occasion."⁶⁴⁷³ Thus the opinion of a man who spoke to Tsafendas twice for a total of twenty minutes is included in the Report while, as we will see, the opinions of people who knew Tsafendas for weeks, months and years are omitted. That Johnston hardly knew Tsafendas is obviously not taken under consideration by the Commission and is not mentioned in the Report.

However, where the Commission glaringly infringes the judicial traditions of neutrality and objectivity is by reporting only part of Johnston's statement. Johnston testified that he had concluded that Tsafendas was "slightly unbalanced and that he seemed to have a mysterious background, but otherwise he appeared to be all right."⁶⁴⁷⁴ The Commission chose to omit the second part of Johnston's sentence but report the first part. A final, blatant act of omission was to come: Johnston also told the police that he had seen Tsafendas the night before the assassination and although he did not speak to him, he "appeared to be perfectly normal."⁶⁴⁷⁵ The Commission omitted this statement, too.

Patrick O'Ryan

*Mr. O'Ryan never gained the impression that there was anything seriously wrong with him. He did tell them, though, about the tapeworm which he was supposed to have. Sometimes he called it a snake, and said that he had to feed it constantly.*⁶⁴⁷⁶

Tsafendas stayed at the O'Ryan household for some five to six months (November 1965-April 1966), and remained close to O'Ryan after he left. The Report has conflated some of O'Ryan's words and omitted others. He did not say that he "never gained the impression that there was anything seriously wrong with him." He said that he believed Tsafendas "was not spiritually or mentally disturbed ... I never got the impression that something was wrong ⁶⁴⁷³ James Johnston statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁷⁴ James Johnston statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁷⁵ James Johnston statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁷⁶ Chapter II C, Paragraph 55.

in his mind.”⁶⁴⁷⁷ Furthermore, he told the court he “never actually doubted his mental state” and that Tsafendas’s mind was similar to the one “the majority of people have.”⁶⁴⁷⁸ There is a significant difference between saying there is nothing seriously wrong and saying there is nothing wrong. The first expression means that while there is nothing seriously wrong, there is something wrong; the second means there is absolutely nothing wrong.

The Report mentions Tsafendas’s references to O’Ryan about the tapeworm. This issue has been discussed extensively in the Trial Chapter but it should be mentioned here that O’Ryan spoke of the tapeworm to the Commission, while he had not done so to the police. As already noted, O’Ryan testified to the Commission after he had testified to the police and after he was asked by the lawyer Wilfrid Cooper to mention it to save Tsafendas’s life.⁶⁴⁷⁹

O’Ryan also made several positive statements about Tsafendas’s character, but none of them was included in the Report. For instance, he said that he formed a “deep liking” for Tsafendas and that he “had confidence in him ... he was a very kindly man. In my experience of him he had a good heart... I never got the impression that something was wrong in his mind,” or that he “was mentally disturbed... he was well-spoken and had good vocabulary.”⁶⁴⁸⁰ O’Ryan’s opinion about Tsafendas is discussed later in this chapter in the “Landlords and Flatmates” section. For his personal relationship with Tsafendas, see his testimony in the Trial Chapter and at Tsafendas’s biography.

Keith Martincich

*At times he heard Tsafendas talking to himself. On one such occasion he heard Tsafendas say that he had dived into the sea from the boat to save people. He clapped his hands and jumped up and down like a child.*⁶⁴⁸¹

These three sentences are excerpted from a lengthy statement by Martincich, who had worked with Tsafendas for three weeks at the Marine Diamond Corporation. While the tone of Martincich’s observations is generally hostile, the Commission’s selection of the incidents

⁶⁴⁷⁷ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁴⁷⁸ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁴⁷⁹ Patrick O’ Ryan in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 6 April 2015.

⁶⁴⁸⁰ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁴⁸¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 56.

quoted seems designed to question Tsafendas's mental stability. It seems Martincich was the only one of two hundred witnesses questioned by the police and the Commission who noticed Tsafendas talking to himself. The author also asked forty-four people who knew Tsafendas if they ever saw him talk to himself and all said absolutely not. For reasons of space, the study will list here only people who knew Tsafendas very well who never spotted him addressing himself:

- His half-sister Katerina Pnefma;⁶⁴⁸²
- Mary Eendracht, his first cousin, who grew up with him in Egypt and Lourenço Marques and spent a lot of time together in a period of nine months in 1964;
- Fotini Gavasiadis who spent every day with him for nine months in Pretoria in 1963-1964;
- Father Michalis Visvinis who visited him for three-four years in prison (1990-1994),⁶⁴⁸³
- Father Nikola Banovic who lived with him at the same house for four months in 1961 and then lived right next to his house for another three;⁶⁴⁸⁴
- Ira Kyriakakis who grew up with him and spent a lot of time together in 1964 and 1965;⁶⁴⁸⁵
- Fathers Minas Constandinou, Ioannis Tsafaridis and Michalis Visvinis, who very regularly visited him in prison and the hospital during the late 1970s, the 1980s and the 1990s;⁶⁴⁸⁶
- Andreas Babiolakis who knew him since they were children, lived with him for two months in 1964 and associated with him for about a year then;⁶⁴⁸⁷
- Thirteen crewmen from the Eleni who saw him every day for forty-two days in 1966;⁶⁴⁸⁸
- Elias Constantaras who lived under the same roof for two months in Cape Town in 1966

⁶⁴⁸² Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁴⁸³ Father Michalis Visvinis in a personal interview, 11 July 2015.

⁶⁴⁸⁴ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

⁶⁴⁸⁵ Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015.

⁶⁴⁸⁶ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015; Father Michalis Visvinis in a personal interview, 11 July 2015.

⁶⁴⁸⁷ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016.

⁶⁴⁸⁸ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Panteleimon Aspiotis in a personal interview, 6 June 2015; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Manolis Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Ioannis Speis in a personal interview, 12 July 2015; Emanuil Tsabouniaris in a personal interview, 19 January 2016; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

and knew him for more than a year;⁶⁴⁸⁹

- Irene Michaletos who knew him very well for more than a year (1964-1965), when he often visited her house in Beira;⁶⁴⁹⁰
- Antony and John Michaletos, Tsafendas's cousins and sons of Artemis Michaletos, Tsafendas's aunt and his father's sister who brought him up in Egypt. They first met Tsafendas in 1951 in Lourenço Marques and got to know him between 1963 and 1965 in Mozambique.⁶⁴⁹¹
- Alexander Moumbaris who spent three months in a cell next to Tsafendas's in Pretoria Prison. They spoke every day for an hour when they exercised together in the prison yard.⁶⁴⁹²
- Costas Poriазis who met him in 1965 in Beira;⁶⁴⁹³
- Alexandra Vaporidis who knew him for about six months in Istanbul in 1961;⁶⁴⁹⁴
- Nick Papadakis, who knew Tsafendas for two-three months and lived with him for two months in Mozambique in 1964;⁶⁴⁹⁵
- Panagiotis Peroglou, Stratis Vamvarapis, Antonis Nichas and Costas Chagios, who were Tsafendas's friends in Cape Town for more than a year.⁶⁴⁹⁶

It could be argued that everyone talks to himself occasionally, either audibly or inaudibly, and the whole human race is not crazy. As for Tsafendas jumping up and down, this is open to speculation. It appears to be childish, but again many people will do something silly on the spur of the moment. Alternatively, Tsafendas may have had a few drinks then – Martincich testified that Tsafendas “occasionally had a few drinks” - or Martincich might have misunderstood his action. The fact is that of two hundred witnesses who knew Tsafendas, most of them much better than Martincich, none testified to ever seeing such behaviour; the same response came from interviews with forty-four other friends and acquaintances by the author. However, what also needs to be mentioned is that the ⁶⁴⁸⁹ Elias Constantaras in a personal interview, 11 April 2015.

⁶⁴⁹⁰ Irene Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

⁶⁴⁹¹ Antony Michaletos in a personal interview, 2 May 2016; John Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

⁶⁴⁹² Alexander Moumbaris in a personal interview, 11 May 2016.

⁶⁴⁹³ Costas Poriазis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

⁶⁴⁹⁴ Alexandra Vaporidis in a personal interview, 23 August 2015.

⁶⁴⁹⁵ Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015.

⁶⁴⁹⁶ Costas Chagios in a personal interview, 14 July 2015; Miltiades Kaldis in a personal interview, 12 March 2016; Antonis Nichas in a personal interview, 31 March 2016; Panagiotis Peroglou in a personal interview, 6 June 2016; Stratis Vamvarapis in a personal interview, 31 May 2016.

Commission omitted from its Report a remark made by Martincich about Tsafendas, namely that he got the impression “there was something mentally wrong with him”⁶⁴⁹⁷ This was his conclusion after seeing Tsafendas mumbling to himself and on one occasion jumping up and down.

Number of the Negative Statements used by the Commission

The Commission has included three of the four negative statements about Tsafendas's mental state from approximately two hundred witnesses who were questioned by the police and the Commission itself. The fourth witness who made a negative statement is Caroline Barbeau who told the police that after speaking to Tsafendas a few times in 1965, she formed the impression that he was “not all there.”⁶⁴⁹⁸ However, the Commission did not include her opinion in the Report, although it was in possession of her testimony. Her statement is examined in the previous two chapters.

POSITIVE STATEMENTS REGARDING TSAFENDAS'S MENTAL STATE INLCUDED IN THE COMMISSION'S REPORT

- *Neither the Chief Messenger nor the two senior messengers had any reason to believe, either during their interview or while Tsafendas was employed at the House of Assembly during August and September, that he was mentally disordered. Nor did the policemen and other messengers who came into contact with him at the House of Assembly notice anything wrong.*⁶⁴⁹⁹
- *During June and July, 1966, he had his meals with Mrs. Scott at No. 42, Chamberlain Street, Woodstock... In her opinion he was normal.*⁶⁵⁰⁰
- *In July, 1966, Tsafendas had a long interview with Mr. Hartford of the Cape Argus. Mr. Hartford's impression was that Tsafendas was normal.*⁶⁵⁰¹

⁶⁴⁹⁷ Keith Terrence Bertram Martincich statement to the police, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁹⁸ Caroline Barbeau statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁴⁹⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 73.

⁶⁵⁰⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 67.

⁶⁵⁰¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 74.

- *According to persons who know the family in Pretoria, they were not exactly taken up with this member of the family. They realized that he was eccentric, but did not think he was mentally disordered.*⁶⁵⁰²
- *Mr. Bornman, who occupied the same room as Tsafendas, stated that Tsafendas did not show any signs of being mentally abnormal.*⁶⁵⁰³
- *On Sunday evening, 4th September, 1966, attended a church service at the home of a certain Mr. Hall in Pinelands. On that occasion he appeared to be normal.*⁶⁵⁰⁴ According to Harry Hall's statement, Tsafendas did not only appear to be normal "on that occasion," but generally. Having knowing him since March 1966 until his arrest, he had testified that he regarded Tsafendas "as a sub-standard intellect, but otherwise found him to be reasonably normal."⁶⁵⁰⁵

The Commission included in its Report the above statements testifying to Tsafendas's mental normality. They come from people who knew him socially or professionally plus his colleagues at the Parliament. The fact that none of his colleagues at the House of Assembly noticed anything wrong with him over the thirty-five days they worked with him is of prime importance. Yet it was not mentioned at the summary trial, where Tsafendas was presented instead as a person who was unable to conduct even his simple duties as a messenger.

POSITIVE STATEMENTS REGARDING TSAFENDAS'S MENTAL STATE OMITTED FROM THE COMMISSION'S REPORT

Although the Commission included the above positive statements about Tsafendas's mental state in its Report, very many more were collected but did not see the light of day, For example:

1. Ralph Lighton, who worked with Tsafendas for nine to ten weeks at the Marine Diamond Corporation, testified to the police that he "never got the slightest impression that he was mentally unsound. He had excellent reasoning powers."⁶⁵⁰⁶

⁶⁵⁰² Chapter II C, Paragraph 6.

⁶⁵⁰³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 58.

⁶⁵⁰⁴ Chapter II C, Paragraph 90.

⁶⁵⁰⁵ Harry Hall statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁰⁶ Ralph Lighton statement to the police, 17 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

2. Charles Woods, Tsafendas's supervisor at Fraser and Chalmers, characterised him as a "good tradesman,"⁶⁵⁰⁷ "a very good worker, far from being a crank, fairly intelligent, but a violent type."⁶⁵⁰⁸
3. Inspector Horacio Ferreira of the Portuguese Security Police was in charge of the cells where Tsafendas was held in custody in Beira in 1964. His statement to the police said he considered Tsafendas to be "normal and regarded him as a very intelligent person."⁶⁵⁰⁹
4. Carel Sebastiaan van Heerden was senior security officer for the Marine Diamond Corporation and worked with Tsafendas for around three months in 1966. "He was friendly, outgoing, and not aloof. I noticed that his eating was messy. Otherwise he was completely normal."⁶⁵¹⁰
5. Johannes Aurets, Tsafendas's supervisor at the South African Railways, told the police Tsafendas "was a well-mannered and well-spoken person. He associated with those working with him. He was soft-spoken and appeared to be of a good nature. During the time he was employed under my supervision, i.e. for approximately three weeks, I did not see him being cross at any time. He was a good worker."⁶⁵¹¹
6. Garnet Muller, Tsafendas's supervisor at South African Railways for three weeks, testified that he "observed Demitrio Tsafendas to possess intelligence above that of the average person who is likely to accept a position with the little responsibility which is attached to that of shed attendant."⁶⁵¹²
7. Hulse, who worked with Tsafendas at Marine Diamond Cooperation from December 1965 to March 12, 1966, stated that Tsafendas "did not appear to be disturbed at any stage."⁶⁵¹³
8. Antonio Teixeira Da Silva, who worked with Tsafendas for five months at F.A. Poole's engineering works in 1965, testified that Tsafendas "was acting normal and I never ⁶⁵⁰⁷ Charles Edwin Woods statement to the police, 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁰⁸ The Cape Times, 9 September 1966: 15, 'Tsafendas in brawl in canteen.'

⁶⁵⁰⁹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵¹⁰ Carel Sebastiaan van Heerden statement to the police, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵¹¹ Johannes Jaonus Uys Aurets statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵¹² Garnet Vincent Muller statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵¹³ Hulse statement to the police, 28 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

noticed anything wrong with him. I have seen an insane person before but I can state that the accused never behaved as an insane person whilst employed here.”⁶⁵¹⁴

9. Albert Vercueil, Tsafendas's boss at F. A. Poole in Pretoria, said that in the five months he worked with Tsafendas, he found him to be “not a very good worker, but will say that he was an intelligent worker.”⁶⁵¹⁵ He also testified to the Commission of Enquiry that he considered Tsafendas to be “an intelligent man, just untidy and lazy in rounding off his work.” He said “Tsafendas was a very friendly, social and talkative person but he was always looking to quarrel with the white workers. He never got the impression that Mr. Tsafendas wasn't right in his mind.”⁶⁵¹⁶
10. August Karel Oestrich worked with Tsafendas for five months at F.A. Poole in Pretoria. He found him to be “very polite, fairly intelligent, well-spoken in both English and German, very courteous and quiet. I never noticed anything abnormal about him, except that he had a strange look when I looked him straight in the eyes. He never gave me the impression that he was suffering from any mental disease.”⁶⁵¹⁷
11. Cornelius Rudolph, the head court interpreter on the staff of the Magistrate of Durban testified that Tsafendas “was in the habit of regularly reporting two or three times a week to ask whether there is any interpretation work.” He used him “on several occasions” over a period of six months and “got to know him pretty well. ... I spoke with him several times. He seemed to be a normal person and intelligent.”⁶⁵¹⁸
12. Nikolaas Nel worked with Tsafendas for five months at F.A. Poole and told the police that Tsafendas “seemed normal.”⁶⁵¹⁹
13. Neville Judson worked with Tsafendas for Mike's Outfitters for forty-two days in July and August 1966. He testified that he “never in no way got the impression that he could ⁶⁵¹⁴ Antonio Teixeira Da Silva statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵¹⁵ Albert Vercueil statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵¹⁶ Albert Vercueil statement to the COE, 25 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵¹⁷ August Karel Oestrich statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵¹⁸ Cornelius Johannes Rudolph statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵¹⁹ Nikolaas Jacobus Nel statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

be mentally deranged. He appeared to be a normal man with normal reasoning powers.”⁶⁵²⁰

14. Johannes Christiaan Oosthuizen, was Tsafendas's tram instructor in December 1965 and January 1966. He testified that “other than his slow response, I did not at all get the impression that mentally anything was wrong with him. He is mentally normal.”⁶⁵²¹
15. Helen Grispos knew Tsafendas from birth and grew up with him, while her husband was Tsafendas's best childhood friend. She told the police that Tsafendas was “well-mannered and intelligent.”⁶⁵²² She also told the author that she never thought Tsafendas was insane. “He never did or said anything to make me or George (her husband) think that he was insane.”⁶⁵²³
16. Hendrik van Loggenberg knew Tsafendas and his family well in Pretoria. He testified that Tsafendas “definitely came across as normal ... he also seemed healthy ...”⁶⁵²⁴
17. Captain P.A. Sanianos, the Greek Consul in Beira “was often in the company of the subject and others had several conversations with him.” He considered Tsafendas to be “a normal and very intelligent person.”⁶⁵²⁵
18. James Summers, owner of the “Barlings Tea Lounge,” which Tsafendas frequented from July 1966 until the assassination, testified that Tsafendas “was no nuisance, and appeared to be a quite normal, innocent type. I never had reason to even suspect that he could be mentally unbalanced. He acted quite normal.”⁶⁵²⁶
19. John Gianouris, the Greek Vice Consul at Lourenço Marques, described Tsafendas as “a normal and intelligent person.”⁶⁵²⁷
20. Kyriakos Skordis who Tsafendas used to visit at his coffee shop in Durban for several ⁶⁵²⁰ Neville Judson statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die ‘Eleni.’ NASA.

⁶⁵²¹ Johannes Christiaan Oosthuizen statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵²² Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵²³ Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013.

⁶⁵²⁴ Hendrik Johannes van Loggenberg statement to the police, 8 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵²⁵ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵²⁶ Herbert James Summers statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵²⁷ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

- months in 1965, testified that he “appeared to be quite normal.”⁶⁵²⁸
21. Inspector Horacio Ferreira of the Portuguese Security Police was in charge of the cells where Tsafendas was held in custody in Beira in 1964. He testified that he considered Tsafendas to be “normal and regarded him as a very intelligent person.”⁶⁵²⁹
22. Costas Michaletos,⁶⁵³⁰ who knew Tsafendas from birth, testified that “Ever since I knew Dimetrios Tsafantakis, I never, any time observed that he showed any deviations. He also never was an aggressive type person.”⁶⁵³¹
23. John Galanakis, who met Tsafendas in Umtali in 1964, told police that he found Tsafendas to be “an intelligent person.”⁶⁵³²
24. Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys, employment officer at the Department of Labour in Cape Town, interviewed Tsafendas twice. He testified to the police that Tsafendas was “neatly dressed” and he “never got the impression that there was mentally anything wrong with him or that he acted abnormally.”⁶⁵³³
25. Gideon Cloete, an employee in the Department of Labour, met Tsafendas twice and said he “seemed eager to get employment, was neatly dressed and had a clean appearance.” Cloete said he saw no signs of abnormality, that “he seemed perfectly normal.”⁶⁵³⁴
26. George Liberopoulos met Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques in 1963 and described him to the police as a “normal person with a very high intelligence.”⁶⁵³⁵ Liberopoulos also stated to the author that he “never believed that Tsafendas was insane. He was perfectly normal; very clever man.”⁶⁵³⁶
27. Reginald Robert Maile was the guard on the Eleni while it was docked in Cape Town

⁶⁵²⁸ Kyriakos Skordis statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵²⁹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵³⁰ The correct spelling is Michaletos, not Michaeletos. Costas Michaeletos statement to the police, 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵³¹ Costas Michaeletos statement to the police, 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵³² Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵³³ Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 1, Sub File: 1/1, Department of Labour. NASA.

⁶⁵³⁴ Gideon Jacobus Cloete testimony at Tsafendas's summary trial, 19 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, NASA.

⁶⁵³⁵ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵³⁶ George Liberopoulos in a personal interview, 6 July 2015.

from July 26, 1966 to September 3, 1966. He saw Tsafendas every day and told the police that he “never got the impression that he could be mentally defective. He was sober, polite and perfectly normal.”⁶⁵³⁷

28. George Ananiades met Tsafendas in 1963 and described him to the police as a “normal person with a very high-intelligence.”⁶⁵³⁸ He later told the author that Tsafendas “is impossible to have been insane. He was a very intelligent and educated man. He was definitely able to function on a reasonable level.”⁶⁵³⁹

29. Ian Boswell, administrative assistant at the Department of Labour in Cape Town. He interviewed Tsafendas three times in 1966 and testified that “he was at all times neatly dressed and never gave the impression of being destitute. Aside from being over-talkative, he showed no symptoms of abnormality, during his interviews with me.”⁶⁵⁴⁰

30. John Verghis, owner of a coffee shop in Beira which Tsafendas visited often for several months, said he considered him to be a “normal person.”⁶⁵⁴¹

31. For two months in 1966 Tsafendas had his meals in Mary Scott's boarding house. She told police that she “never got the impression that he could be mentally unbalanced. To me he appeared perfectly normal.”⁶⁵⁴²

32. Lt. Col. P.J.B. van Wyk of the South African police interviewed several people in Rhodesia and in Mozambique, including in Beira and Lourenço Marques, who knew Tsafendas. He stated in his report that Tsafendas, “for all purposes, can be seen as a normal, intelligent person.”⁶⁵⁴³

⁶⁵³⁷ Reginald Robert Maile statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die ‘Eleni.’ NASA.

⁶⁵³⁸ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵³⁹ George Ananiades in a personal interview, 21 June 2016.

⁶⁵⁴⁰ Ian James Murdock Boswell statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64. NASA.

⁶⁵⁴¹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁵⁴² Mary Kathleen Scott statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁴³ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

33. John Bornman lived with Tsafendas for six-seven weeks in April and May of 1966. He testified to the police that he found Tsafendas to be “normal, intelligent and friendly. He was neat in his person, but his eating habits were messy.”⁶⁵⁴⁴
34. Patrick O’Ryan hosted Tsafendas in his home for five months in 1965-1966 and was close to him up to his arrest. Tsafendas was described to him by a preacher of the Christian Church as a “highly cultured gentleman, a very refined gentleman who speaks seven languages.”⁶⁵⁴⁵ He formed a “deep liking”⁶⁵⁴⁶ for Tsafendas and considered him to be an “enlightened person.”⁶⁵⁴⁷ He “never got the impression that something was wrong in his mind,” or that he was “mentally disturbed.”⁶⁵⁴⁸
35. Violet Irene Manning was Tsafendas’s landlady for almost two months in 1965. She told the Commission of Enquiry: “it was a serviced room but I found him making his own bed. When he came to me he was well-dressed, well-spoken, and gave a good impression. From his general appearance he appeared to be a businessman. When he paid me, he had a bundle of notes and I took him to be a man of means.”⁶⁵⁴⁹
36. Elizabeth Groves was Tsafendas’s landlady for six or seven weeks and a retired psychiatric nurse. About Tsafendas she said, “I was a nurse and worked in lunatic institutions. He was a normal person to the best of my knowledge.”⁶⁵⁵⁰
37. Alice Mary Theyser was Tsafendas’s landlady from July 1, 1966 to August 30, 1966, just six days before the assassination. She testified that she “never got the impression in any way that he might be mentally unbalanced. To me he appeared a quite normal person.”⁶⁵⁵¹

⁶⁵⁴⁴ Jacobus Johannes Borman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵⁴⁵ Patrick O’ Ryan in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes.

⁶⁵⁴⁶ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁵⁴⁷ Patrick O’ Ryan in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes.

⁶⁵⁴⁸ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁵⁴⁹ Violet Irene Manning statement to the COE, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse polisie. NASA.

⁶⁵⁵⁰ Elizabeth Magdalene Groves statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵⁵¹ Alice Mary Theyser statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

38. Helen Daniels lived with Tsafendas in her parents' house for six weeks in 1965 and "did not notice anything abnormal about him. There was never any indication that he was mentally abnormal."⁶⁵⁵²
39. Richard Poggenpoel lived with him for two weeks in his house and kept on associating up to his arrest, "there was no mention or impression that he was mentally abnormal. He lived a completely normal life."⁶⁵⁵³
40. J. Willemse was Tsafendas's landlord for one month in 1965. He characterised him as a "sophisticated, friendly and well-spoken man."⁶⁵⁵⁴
41. Marika Tsafantakis Tsafendas's stepmother, testified to the Commission that Tsafendas was "definitely not insane."⁶⁵⁵⁵
42. Victor Tsafandakis, Tsafendas's stepbrother, testified to the Commission that Tsafendas was "definitely not insane."⁶⁵⁵⁶
43. Mrs. Tsafandakis, wife of Victor Tsafandakis and Tsafendas's sister-in-law, testified to the Commission that Tsafendas was "definitely not insane."⁶⁵⁵⁷
44. Eleni Vlachopoulos, Tsafendas's stepsister, testified to the Commission that Tsafendas was "definitely not insane."⁶⁵⁵⁸
45. Evangelia Nissiotis, Tsafendas's stepsister, testified to the Commission that Tsafendas was "definitely not insane."⁶⁵⁵⁹

As we see from the foregoing, there were at least another forty-five statements in the Commission's possession where people had commented positively about Tsafendas's mental state and all were omitted. Some were particularly important because they were from people ⁶⁵⁵² Helen Dorothy Daniels statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, NASA.

⁶⁵⁵³ Richard Poggenpoel statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁵⁴ Sunday Times, 11 September 1966: 1, 8. 'Assassin-man with a chip on his shoulder.'

⁶⁵⁵⁵ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁵⁵⁶ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁵⁵⁷ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁵⁵⁸ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁵⁵⁹ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

who had lived with him or worked with him and knew him well. Thus the positive statements about Tsafendas's mental state total 51 out of the 200 statements, or 25.5%. Of the remaining statements, 4 were negative, 2%, while the rest of the witnesses made no comment on Tsafendas's mental state, presumably because his conduct as they knew it never suggested there could be anything wrong with him. Out of the 4 negatives, 3 were included. That makes it 3 out of the 4 negative and 6 (since we are not sure about the number of his colleagues in the Parliament the Commission refers to) out of the 51 positive. Thus, the Commission made use of 75% of the negative statements in comparison to 11.7% of the positive ones. It should be also noted that exactly the same thing has happened with other positive and negative statements regarding Tsafendas's personality; all the negative ones are included, while only a very small number of the positives is mentioned.

It is notable that the negative responses came from people who did not know Tsafendas well. The fact that Johnson, who had spoken to Tsafendas for twenty minutes in his entire life, is included, while the words of people who knew him well are omitted is indicative of the Commission's aim.

The author has also interviewed several people who lived, worked and knew Tsafendas, but their statements will not be included here as they were not in possession of the Commission. However, they are included in the Trial Chapter. Finally, one more significant opinion is that of the US Immigration authorities. They dealt with Tsafendas for five years and were aware of his hospitalizations while in the United States. They also knew that he had faked mental illness in 1943 while he was in their custody, discovered when he was taken to a hospital. It was for that reason that they believed "he was unstable though not (not)⁶⁵⁶⁰ insane."⁶⁵⁶¹ The Commission makes no mention at all of their opinion.

CONCLUSION

Only four of two hundred people who were interviewed by the COE and the police testified negatively about Tsafendas's mental state and none of these four could be considered a reliable witness. Johnston had spoken to Tsafendas for twenty minutes all his life, de Vos initially testified to the police that Tsafendas was perfectly normal and then told the Commission that he was mad, while Martincich was the only witness out of two hundred who ⁶⁵⁶⁰ This is exactly how it appears in the telegram. There is a second 'not' within brackets.

⁶⁵⁶¹ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Washington to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

noticed that Tsafendas was talking to himself and assumed he was mad. That leaves only Barbeau, who, like Johnston, was a member of the Christian Church, and clearly tried to distance herself from Tsafendas by belittling him. Even these four “negative” statements did not mention any of the things that were stated in court about Tsafendas, namely that he was unable to function on a reasonable level or follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, that his speech was disjointed, that he suffered from thought-blocking and that he had confused ideas. The fact that the Report contains 75% of the negative statements about Tsafendas's mental state but only 11.7% of the positive ones points to a significant bias by the Commission.

TSAFENDAS'S EMPLOYMENT

In this section, the study deals with Tsafendas's employment record and what his colleagues thought of him. Tsafendas was medically examined for some of these jobs and was found to be perfectly healthy each time. However, the issue of the medical examinations will not be discussed here since it is considered at length in the section Medical Examinations.

The Commission refers to several positions which Tsafendas held, but the study will comment only on those which raise doubts over issues such as the Commission's treatment of witnesses' statements, omissions, repetitions, undue bias and so on. As we will see, the Commission's Report invariably dwells on situations which place Tsafendas in a bad light while passing swiftly over jobs where workers had positive things to say about him. Anything which supports the theory that Tsafendas was mad or as described by the psychiatrists at his summary trial is included, while anything that contradicts the theory is omitted.

IN GERMANY

*It appears that Tsafendas was employed in Germany during 1959 from where he went via France to the United Kingdom in May, 1959. (B.7771.)*⁶⁵⁶²

This sketchy, two-line summary omits a large amount of information, much of it complimentary to Tsafendas, which was well known to the Commission. In September 1958, Tsafendas travelled to West Germany from Belgium and registered at Frankfurt Aliens Office.⁶⁵⁶³ On September 18 he started work as a welder at the heavy engineering company of Fries and Son in a Frankfurt suburb. Mr. Horst Hartmann, Senior Personnel Officer at the company, said,

“He drove up here in a big battered American car. I thought he was more likely to apply for an executive job than as a welder. Well-dressed and well-mannered, he was extremely courteous ... a very pleasant man. He looked like a satisfied, successful businessman, and his looks certainly didn't fit the job he wanted. But he spoke good German, so I took him on. We liked him ... always laughing, a good worker.”⁶⁵⁶⁴

⁶⁵⁶² Chapter II B, Paragraph 27.

⁶⁵⁶³ The Cape Argus, 7 September 1966 (late edition): 2. ‘Did he live in W. Germany?’

⁶⁵⁶⁴ Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, ‘He made a good impression’; Daily Express, 8 September 1966: 2, ‘The assassin’; Natal Witness, 10 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas was so friendly ...’; O Primeiro de Janeiro, 8 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas trabalhou como soldador em Frankforte.’

Six weeks later Tsafendas left Fries and Son voluntarily, with a very good reference in his briefcase. Horst Hartmann said, "He left of his own accord ... we would have liked to keep him."⁶⁵⁶⁵ Tsafendas also made a lasting impression on Guenter Haafe, fifty-seven, the factory gatekeeper, who after the assassination remembered the jovial greeting Tsafendas gave him every morning. He said:

"He was a jolly man, always smiling and friendly. He would almost always come into my locker room to say hi. He was really one of the friendliest workers I have met and trust me, in my twelve years as a doorman I have seen thousands and thousands of faces coming in and out. This man was courteous; they do not make them like that anymore."⁶⁵⁶⁶

Three other workmates said, "He was a nice guy," "He was a good comrade" and "He left me with a good impression."⁶⁵⁶⁷ Tsafendas then worked for six months for Anglo-American Fashions and Designers in Frankfurt, and for about another six months at a US Army printing works in Hochst, a district of Frankfurt.⁶⁵⁶⁸

The Commission was well aware of the above information, but saw fit to exclude it from its Report. It might be argued that a listing of work places was relatively unimportant, but the same cannot be said of the witnesses' comments. Not only were the opinions ventured about Tsafendas positive, they showed him in a completely different light to the way he was pictured at the summary trial. There, Tsafendas was described as a bad worker, dirty, looking neglected, withdrawn, isolated, unsociable, unfriendly and uncommunicative. The contrast with the views of his workmates could hardly be greater.

⁶⁵⁶⁵ Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, 'He made a good impression'; Daily Express, 8 September 1966: 2, 'The assassin'; Natal Witness, 10 September 1966, 'Tsafendas was so friendly ...'; O Primeiro de Janeiro, 8 September 1966, 'Tsafendas trabalhou como soldador em Frankforte.'

⁶⁵⁶⁶ Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, 'He made a good impression'; Natal Witness, 10 September 1966, 'Tsafendas was so friendly ...'; O Primeiro de Janeiro, 8 September 1966, 'Tsafendas trabalhou como soldador em Frankforte.'

⁶⁵⁶⁷ Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, 'He made a good impression'; Natal Witness, 10 September 1966, 'Tsafendas was so friendly ...'; O Primeiro de Janeiro, 8 September 1966, 'Tsafendas trabalhou como soldador em Frankforte.'

⁶⁵⁶⁸ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

THE LIMASOLLU NACI COLLEGE IN ISTANBUL

*The next country he visited was Turkey. It appears that he was there during the second half of 1961 and the beginning of 1962. He was employed for two months as a teacher of English.*⁶⁵⁶⁹

Another item on the file contains the following note:

*“Applicant can speak German and a little Afrikaans. English fluently. 1963—Marine Watchman in Lisbon— (Certificate issued by Police in Portugal seen) 1961-1962— Teacher of English at Limasolla Nace College, Turkey.”*⁶⁵⁷⁰

The Commission here reveals something very important: that Tsafendas was employed as a teacher of English while in Turkey. This had already been published by the South African media and Tsafendas had referred to it when he was questioned by the police; however, it was not mentioned during the summary trial. The reference in the Report was not only brief, but incomplete and inaccurate. The name of the school where Tsafendas taught was not given in the first reference to Turkey in Chapter II B of the Report, although it was known to the Commission and was stated in the second reference, in Chapter VI.

The length of time that Tsafendas spent as a teacher is wrong, being closer to six months than two. However, it was Tsafendas who told the police that he had worked for two months.⁶⁵⁷¹ Why he got this wrong is not known to the study, but could be due to confusion under pressure from police questioning or fatigue or a simple miscalculation. The figure of approximately six months was confirmed by Father Nikola Banovic and Alexandra Vaporidis, who met Tsafendas in Istanbul. Tsafendas spent four months living at the home of Father Nikola, who said Tsafendas attended at the college throughout this time. He continued teaching there for another two or three months until he resigned in the middle of December 1961.⁶⁵⁷²

Let us now consider a few things about the college and its owner. Limasollu Naci (1921-1992), who became one of Tsafendas's best friends, was a Turkish-Cypriot who moved from Cyprus to Turkey when he was four. He began his working life as a photographer and in 1940 became the first professional to use cine film in Istanbul. He held

⁶⁵⁶⁹ Chapter II B, Paragraph 37.

⁶⁵⁷⁰ Chapter VI, Paragraph 4.

⁶⁵⁷¹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵⁷² Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Alexandra Vaporidis in a personal interview, 23 August 2014.

his first photo exhibition at the Faculty of Arts in 1947, opened his second in 1948 at the Community Centre in Beyoğlu, and later exhibited his work in Paris and London. He won first prize in an international photography contest in Turin, Italy in 1948.⁶⁵⁷³ Limasollu is widely recognised as pre-eminent in the provision of private foreign language instruction and distance learning in Turkey. He also pioneered the concept of introducing young Turks to foreign languages at summer camps, initially in the coastal regions of Turkey and later in Britain.⁶⁵⁷⁴ He established the Istanbul College that bears his name in 1953; it was the first private language institute in Turkey and widely considered to be the best and most prestigious, with many students from wealthy and powerful families.⁶⁵⁷⁵

Tsafendas's college work flatly contradicts the trial presentation of him, especially with regard to his ability to work and even to function on an everyday basis. In court he was portrayed as unable to function on a reasonable level, unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, talking in a disjointed manner, suffering from thought-disorder and unable to do more than a menial job. Therefore, if his work at the college was known, the natural question would have been: How was it possible that a schizophrenic man with all the aforementioned disabilities managed to secure such a position and keep it for six months?

In addition, Tsafendas used the reference he received from Mr. Limasollu Naci to get his job at Parliament. For this reason if for no other, one would have expected the South African authorities or the Commission to inquire about Tsafendas's time at the Istanbul College. Strangely, while these officials made enquiries all around the world and managed to find information from almost everywhere Tsafendas had been, Turkey came up empty. Tsafendas spent six to seven months in Turkey holding down a job which seemed far beyond the abilities of his emerging picture, yet nothing is said about it. We cannot, of course, exclude the possibility that the Commission did indeed discover about Tsafendas's time at the college, but then chose to omit its findings because they would contradict the way he was represented in court.

⁶⁵⁷³ En so Haber, 23 May 2012, 'Limasollu Naci kimdir.'

⁶⁵⁷⁴ Akinturk, 2011: 2014

⁶⁵⁷⁵ Durgun, 2013: 2; Advije Vedia Limasollu in a personal interview, 8 January 2016.

F.A. POOLE

On 7th February, 1964, he started work as a fitter with Messrs. F. A. Poole (Pty.), Ltd.

*A foreman employed by the firm gave evidence that once Tsafendas had threatened to stab him with a knife and another person gave evidence that one day Tsafendas had threatened a Bantu with a knife. A Portuguese who was also employed by the firm said that Tsafendas had assumed a hostile attitude towards him because he had refused to discuss Dr. Salazar with him.*⁶⁵⁷⁶

*On 10th July, 1964, Mr. Vercueil dismissed Tsafendas from employment with Messrs. F. A. Poole (Pty.), Ltd., because of the untidiness of his work and his constant quarrelling with the other workers.*⁶⁵⁷⁷

Tsafendas's argument with a colleague about Salazar

This issue is discussed in the "Political Activities and Ideas" section of this chapter.

Tsafendas's Dismissal from F.A. Poole

The Commission stated that Tsafendas was dismissed because of his constant quarrelling with the other workers. This tells only half of the story. What the Commission omitted was that Tsafendas argued only with the White workers and not the non-Whites. Vercueil told the Commission that "Tsafendas was a very friendly, social and talkative person, but he was always looking to quarrel with the white workers." Vercueil "would usually receive complaints from the other (white) foremen, but never from the black workers."⁶⁵⁷⁸

Furthermore, Vercueil had testified to the police that Tsafendas "bullied the other Portuguese workers. He had fights with several white workers."⁶⁵⁷⁹ Nikolaas Nel, another worker, testified that Tsafendas "was certainly unpopular among white workers. Accused adapted more to the non-whites."⁶⁵⁸⁰

⁶⁵⁷⁶ Chapter III C, Paragraph 8.

⁶⁵⁷⁷ Chapter III C, Paragraph 10.

⁶⁵⁷⁸ Albert Vercueil statement to the COE, 25 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁷⁹ Albert Vercueil statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵⁸⁰ Nikolaas Jacobus Nel statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

In addition, although Vercueil dismissed Tsafendas for “untidiness in his work,” he had also stated that “he was an intelligent worker, mainly because he quickly grasped when work was entrusted to him. However, I found him very sloppy in his work. I found him to be very friendly, but very opinionated. He would not, for example, work according to the assignment, but as he decides...Personally I would say that he is an intelligent person and completely mentally balanced. I now show some tools and work produced by the accused personally and performed to give you an idea of the degree of initiative he laid to the day ... F.A. Poole moved from their warehouse and Mr. Tsafendas was tasked with organizing the move and he handled it effortlessly.”⁶⁵⁸¹

Colleagues' Opinions about Tsafendas

Vercueil also testified to the Commission that “he never got the impression that Mr. Tsafendas wasn't right in his mind. F.A. Poole moved from their warehouse and Mr. Tsafendas was tasked with organizing the move and he handled it effortlessly.”⁶⁵⁸² These statements are very important because they contradict claims that Tsafendas was a bad worker, unable to do more than a menial job, withdrawn and isolated. The Commission omitted from its Report the assessment of Tsafendas's mental state and character offered by Vercueil (“friendly, sociable, talkative, quarrelsome with whites”), who worked with him for five months, while including the negative opinion of James Johnston, who spoke to Tsafendas for twenty minutes in his entire life. Vercueil testified that after Tsafendas was dismissed, he threatened him and Dr. Verwoerd. This issue is discussed in the section on Tsafendas's political activities and ideas.

Vercueil's comments about Tsafendas's character are not the only ones from employees at F.A. Poole. Three other men gave evidence about Tsafendas, each having worked with him for five months:

⁶⁵⁸¹ Albert Vercueil statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA; Albert Vercueil statement to the COE, 25 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁸² Albert Vercueil statement to the COE, 25 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

- Antonio Teixeira Da Silva testified that Tsafendas “was acting normal and I never noticed anything wrong with him. I have seen an insane person before but I can state that the accused never behaved as an insane person whilst employed here.”⁶⁵⁸³
- Nikolaas Nel testified that Tsafendas “seemed normal,” but also that he had a “messy and dirty appearance.”⁶⁵⁸⁴
- August Karel Oestrich testified that he found him to be “very polite, fairly intelligent, well-spoken in both English and German, very courteous and quiet. I never noticed anything abnormal about him, except that he had a strange look when I looked him straight in the eyes. He never gave me the impression that he was suffering from any mental disease.”⁶⁵⁸⁵

FRASER AND CHALMERS

*His next employers were Messrs. Frazer and Chalmers, at Mandini, Zululand. There he worked as a fitter and turner from 19th April, 1965 to 19th May, ' 1965, when he was dismissed after a fight with a Greek, a certain Nicholas Vergos.*⁶⁵⁸⁶

The Commission deals extensively with the fight, but does not say anything about Tsafendas's work there. The fight is examined in detail at the ‘Vergos incident’ section in this chapter. An important omission here is a statement by Charles Woods, Tsafendas's supervisor at Fraser and Chalmers. Woods characterised Tsafendas as a “good tradesman,”⁶⁵⁸⁷ “a very good worker, far from being a crank, fairly intelligent, but a violent type.”⁶⁵⁸⁸ Woods's statement is yet another contradiction of the claims in court that Tsafendas was a poor worker fit only for menial jobs.

⁶⁵⁸³ Antonio Teixeira Da Silva statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁸⁴ Nikolaas Jacobus Nel statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁸⁵ August Karel Oestrich statement to the police, n.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵⁸⁶ Chapter II C, Paragraph 28.

⁶⁵⁸⁷ Charles Edwin Woods statement to the police, 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁸⁸ The Cape Times, 9 September 1966: 15, ‘Tsafendas in brawl in canteen.’

CITY TRAMWAYS

On 12th November, 1965, he applied for a position as a bus conductor with City Tramways, Cape Town. Once again he was examined medically and nothing was found to be wrong with him. He stated, inter alia, that he had never had a nervous breakdown. He had to report as a learner-conductor on 24th November, 1965, but he did not do so until 29th December, 1965. The instructor noted the following, inter alia, concerning him: "Trainee is slow and seems lazy too. He won't last long if he passes out. Slow in uptake. Won't last. Mind seems blank at times.

In any case Tsafendas found the work too exacting, and he resigned on 12th January, 1966.⁶⁵⁸⁹

All the above information is taken from a statement by Johannes Christiaan Oosthuizen, the Tramways' instructor. He also said: "Other than his slow response, I did not at all get the impression that mentally anything was wrong with him. He is mentally normal. There are many rejected applicants because they are found to be of a bad standard."⁶⁵⁹⁰ Once more, the Commission acts as censor by selection, including what is negative about Tsafendas and omitting what is positive and thus giving a distorted impression of what Oosthuizen actually said.

GROOTE SCHUUR HOSPITAL APPLICATION

In the meantime he applied on 17th November, 1965, to the personnel officer of Groote Schuur Hospital for a position in the reception section. Owing to his lack of qualifications, as well as the poor impression he made on the officer concerned, the application was not successful.⁶⁵⁹¹

The Commission states that Tsafendas made a poor impression on the personnel officer who interviewed him (his name in the statement is indecipherable). However, that is not what the officer said. His words were, "apart from his lack of qualifications, the applicant did not impress me as a person in other respects suitable for appointment as Receptionist

⁶⁵⁸⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 49.

⁶⁵⁹⁰ Johannes Christiaan Oosthuizen statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁹¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 50.

Officer at this hospital.”⁶⁵⁹² What he is saying is that apart from his lack of formal qualifications, Tsafendas did not have the other attributes necessary to be a receptionist. This had nothing to do with the impression he made personally on the officer. In a new twist to its generally hostile approach, this is not a case of the Commission including yet another negative opinion about Tsafendas, but of inventing one where none exists.

MARINE DIAMOND CORPORATION

The next place where he sought employment was the Marine Diamond Corporation in Cape Town.

*On 13th January, 1966, he was examined by this company's medical officer and nothing was found to be wrong with him. Once again he declared that he had never had any mental or nervous disease.*⁶⁵⁹³

Mr. Martincich, who worked with Tsafendas on the Colponton, told the Commission that Tsafendas occasionally had a few drinks or drank a bottle of light wine and then talked a lot of nonsense. On one occasion Tsafendas told him that the South African Government would not last long. When this witness told him on another occasion that he was talking nonsense, Tsafendas wanted to assault him, but when he saw that the witness was going to use Karate against him, he immediately calmed down and apologized. On another occasion he said that he was expecting a large sum of money, that he was an important businessman and that he really did not know why he was wasting his time on the boat.

*He was often in the company of non-Whites and explained that they were more sympathetic towards him than the Whites. According to this witness, Tsafendas was exceptionally lazy and childish, and his table manners were bad. At times he heard Tsafendas talking to himself. On one such occasion he heard Tsafendas say that he had dived into the sea from the boat to save people. He clapped his hands and jumped up and down like a child.*⁶⁵⁹⁴

The Commission refers to Tsafendas's employment in Marine Diamond Corporation in Chapter II C, Paragraphs 53, 55, 56 and 57. The Commission includes the fact that “he was examined by this company's medical officer and nothing was found to be wrong with him.

⁶⁵⁹² Personnel Officer's statement regarding Tsafendas's application, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Leer W.D. 10//4102 Dor Stafendas. NASA.

⁶⁵⁹³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 53.

⁶⁵⁹⁴ Chapter II C, Paragraph 56.

Once again he declared that he had never had any mental or nervous disease.” This is something that will be examined later in this chapter, in the section about the Medical Examinations.

Most of the information in the Report about Tsafendas's time with the company is from his colleague, Keith Martincich. Martincich was one of five workmates who testified to the police and the Commission. The other four colleagues evidently knew Tsafendas much better than Martincich, as they had worked with him at least three times longer than Martincich's three weeks, and had given more detailed statements about his behaviour and time in the job. Yet the Commission included almost all of Martincich's testimony while ignoring that of those who knew him better. It is the only time in the Report that the Commission has used so many details from a single witness's statement.

These four other colleagues had all spoke in a positive manner about Tsafendas, but their statements were not used and it was the generally hostile statement by Martincich, which dominated the Commission's Report. The only point which appeared from the other four colleagues' statements was that Tsafendas “expressed his disapproval of the Government's colour policy” to his colleagues. This was significant in view of a reference by the Commission to Tsafendas talking a lot of nonsense when drinking. The Report did not specify the nature of this “nonsense,” although Martincich had spelled it out as follows:

“On various occasions he had said that he was staying with a Coloured or Malay family in Lansdowne. He also said the Coloureds were better than the Europeans. He said they were more friendly and had more sense than the Europeans, and showed more understanding. When I said he was talking nonsense, he got cross and lifted himself as though he wanted to tackle me.”⁶⁵⁹⁵

This statement is precisely the opposite of what was heard at the summary trial, that Tsafendas was unsympathetic towards Coloured people, which may have been why it was left out of the Report. What the reader does not learn is that Tsafendas's “nonsense” talk actually constituted his views on serious political and social matters. Such opinions would certainly not have been considered nonsense by many people if the Commission had explained what the so-called nonsense was.

⁶⁵⁹⁵ Keith Terrence Bertram Martincich statement to the police, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Martincich's testimony that Tsafendas spoke against the government and apartheid is included in the Report, but a positive remark is omitted. This was that Martincich, who spoke to Tsafendas every day, got "the impression that he was a sociable type."⁶⁵⁹⁶ This contradicts evidence at the summary trial from psychiatrists who examined him and diagnosed him as "rather isolated from his surroundings"⁶⁵⁹⁷ and a "withdrawn and isolated individual."⁶⁵⁹⁸ As we have seen, tens of people testified that Tsafendas was a sociable, talkative and friendly person, but none of these statements were included by the Commission. Martincich's comment that Tsafendas was mumbling to himself and on one occasion had jumped up and down has been examined in the "Mental State" section of this chapter.

Let us examine now what the other four colleagues of Tsafendas told the Commission and the police:

- Carel Sebastiaan van Heerden was senior security officer for the Marine Diamond Corporation and worked with Tsafendas for around three months in 1966. He testified that, "We were transferred from the Marina on a small outboard boat to the Col pontoon. It was terrible, rough seas, so much so that almost all of us old hands got seasick. It struck me that Tsafendas adapted well. He was one of the few who were not seasick. Upon landing, he filled the mess basin on the lower deck with water and started shaving. His calm way struck me that he must know the sea. Tsafendas was employed as a pump, or engineer, operator and did not work under my direct supervision. I introduced myself to him and talked to him. He was friendly, outgoing, and not aloof. I noticed that his eating was messy. Otherwise he was completely normal."⁶⁵⁹⁹
- Ralph Lighton, who worked with Tsafendas for nine to ten weeks at the Marine Diamond Corporation, testified to the police that he "never got the slightest impression that he was mentally unsound. He had excellent reasoning powers."⁶⁶⁰⁰

⁶⁵⁹⁶ Keith Terrence Bertram Martincich statement to the police, 4 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁵⁹⁷ Dr. Harold Cooper's testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 17 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA; Jacobus Andreas Johannes Erasmus' testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 20 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁵⁹⁸ Reyner van Zyl's testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁵⁹⁹ Carel Sebastiaan van Heerden statement to the police, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁶⁰⁰ Ralph Lighton statement to the police, 17 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

- Hulse, who worked with Tsafendas at Marine Diamond Cooperation from December 1965 to March 12, 1966, stated that Tsafendas “did not appear to be disturbed at any stage.”⁶⁶⁰¹
- Gillian Clare Lieberman, personnel secretary at Marine Diamond Corporation, whose office Tsafendas visited testified, “I had various discussions with him. I got quite interested in him as an individual... By his talks he gave me the impression that he does not agree with authority (Governmental or other). I cut him short, saying that in my capacity of my work I do not discuss politics. I found him intelligent, someone apparently able to reason in conversation, but a strange type of person, a unique character. Apart from him being well travelled etc. I got the impression that he was physically different in dress and appearance. He was a big man, with a particularly striking big hat, stainless steel teeth, sloppy dirty clothing.”⁶⁶⁰²

At least three of these four witnesses, Hulse, Lighton and van Heerden, and maybe even Lieberman, too, spent more time with Tsafendas than the three weeks Martincich did. All testified that Tsafendas was perfectly sane and they commented positively about his intelligence. Yet none of their comments was used in the Report. Two praised Tsafendas's verbal skills, saying that he had “excellent reasoning powers” and was “able to reason in conversation.” These two statements are important in that they contradict the psychiatrists' trial evidence, that Tsafendas was “unable to function on a reasonable level,” “unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes” and that he talked in a “disjointed manner.” However, these opinions were omitted from the Report.

Another very important omission is van Heerden's statement describing Tsafendas working in difficult conditions in a calm and confident manner – a sharp contrast to the oft-repeated claims that he could barely manage menial work. An example of the latter is Smorenberg's claim that Tsafendas made childish mistakes at work. This statement was, of course, included. Finally, the Report carried no mention of Tsafendas being characterised as friendly and outgoing, clearly so as not to muddy the picture presented at the trial of a withdrawn, unsociable and isolated individual.

⁶⁶⁰¹ Hulse statement to the police, 28 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁶⁰² Gillian Claire Lieberman statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

MAGISTRATE'S COURT IN DURBAN

*From time to time Tsafendas acted as an interpreter at the Magistrate's Court in Durban, and he acquitted himself fairly well of his task.*⁶⁶⁰³

Tsafendas worked for some five months as a part-time interpreter, providing his services whenever needed. The head interpreter at the Court, Cornelius Johannes Rudolph, said, "It happened that I made use of his services on several occasions. He was in the habit of regularly reporting two or three times a week to ask whether there is any interpretation work. I got to know him pretty well and would have no trouble identifying him. I spoke with him several times, he seemed to be a normal person and intelligent. He spoke English properly."⁶⁶⁰⁴

Although Rudolph does not refer directly to Tsafendas's working abilities, we can assume they must have been acceptable since he used him several times. However, the important thing here is Rudolph's personal opinion of Tsafendas. Having spoken to him several times, he found him to be a normal, intelligent person. However, Rudolph's opinion is omitted from the Commission's Report.

SOUTH AFRICAN RAILWAYS

On 16th March, 1965, he was employed by the South African Railways and Harbours as a shed attendant at R90 per month. He was examined medically and nothing was found to be wrong with him. In a written statement in connection with this examination he stated, inter alia, that he had never had any nervous or mental disease. When he was employed by the Railways, he was so poor that the Railway staff collected R2 for him. It was arranged for him to board at a railway hostel. On one occasion while he was working there he intimated that to his mind the South African Government was handling its Bantu problems better than Great Britain was dealing with problems in connection with the West Indians.

On 6th April, 1965, one of his fellow workers gave him a dousing for a joke. The result was that Tsafendas immediately absconded. However, he remained at the hostel until 14th April, ⁶⁶⁰³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 25.

⁶⁶⁰⁴ Cornelius Johannes Rudolph statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

1965, and when he left he took the Bible that was in his room with him.⁶⁶⁰⁵

As usual, the Commission portrays Tsafendas in a negative fashion – he accepts charity, cannot take a joke, walks out on his job (which it describes as absconding) and steals a Bible. The only positive mention is that “nothing was found to be wrong with him” when he was medically examined. This could hardly have been omitted as passing a medical was known to be necessary for a job with the company. The issue of the medical is considered in the Medical Examinations and Hospitalizations section of this chapter.

Then, the Report says:

“On one occasion while he was working there, he intimated that to his mind the South African Government was handling its Bantu problems better than Great Britain was dealing with problems in connection with the West Indians.”

No statement or any other evidence has been found that contains this reported remark, but it could easily have been included in material that has gone missing. Here again the Report carries a statement which appears to show Tsafendas supporting the apartheid government. Omitted are instances, known to the Commission, where he criticised or condemned the government and declared his Communist beliefs.

The author cannot know the circumstances under which Tsafendas made his reported statement about the ‘Bantu problem,’ assuming that he made it at all. The fact is it is not what he really believed. However, working as he did for a government company, he would have been very stupid publicly to criticise the government’s racial policies, as he did to many of his friends and acquaintances. Examples of Tsafendas’s real political beliefs have been listed on several occasions on this study. The statement quoted in the Report was read to forty-four people who knew Tsafendas and every one denied that Tsafendas could have meant what he supposedly said. For reasons of space, their names will not be included here, but this issue has been examined in the Trial Chapter.

It is important to mention here that Garnet Muller, Tsafendas’s supervisor at this job, gave a statement to the police which was in the Commission’s possession. Muller testified that Tsafendas gave him to understand that he took the job on a temporary basis. He said he had “observed Tsafendas to possess intelligence above that of the average person who is likely to accept a position with the little responsibility which is attached to that of shed attendant.”⁶⁶⁰⁶

⁶⁶⁰⁵ Chapter II C, Paragraph 26.

Johannes Aurets, another of Tsafendas's supervisors at South African Railways, told the police Tsafendas “was a well-mannered and well-spoken person. He associated with those working with him. He was soft-spoken and appeared to be of a good nature. During the time he was employed under my supervision, i.e. for approximately three weeks, I did not see him being cross at any time. He was a good worker.”⁶⁶⁰⁷ The Commission preferred to ignore these two character observations and instead highlight the irrelevant facts that Tsafendas was very poor and someone played a joke on him, which he did not like. The issue of the Bible has been discussed earlier in this chapter.

TABLE BAY POWER STATION

*In Cape Town his first job was that of a fitter and turner at the Table Bay Power Station. He started work there on 13th September, 1965, but his work being unsatisfactory he was given seven days' notice on 25th October of the same year. He then immediately resigned. The foreman under whom he worked found that at times he made childish mistakes.*⁶⁶⁰⁸

The above statement is correct, but again important information is omitted. Two employees from this company were interviewed by the Commission and the police. One was Owen Smorenberg, the foreman mentioned above, who also acted as defence witness in the summary trial, and the other was Redvers Wakfer, who interviewed Tsafendas for the job. It was Smorenberg who testified that Tsafendas made childish mistakes in his work and he had said the same at the summary trial. Since his testimony has been examined there, Chapter Five, the matter will not be discussed here again. What is important here is that the Commission included this negative comment about his working abilities, but omitted most of the many positive statements from colleagues who testified that he was a good worker.

A surprising omission here is Smorenberg's impression that Tsafendas was unsympathetic towards the Coloureds and that he believed that Vorster and Dr. Verwoerd were the right men to be in these positions.⁶⁶⁰⁹ This is what Smorenberg told the court and said to the police. This statement has been examined in the Trial Chapter. What is also omitted is what Redvers Wakfer told the police, that Tsafendas “appeared to be quite normal and was neatly dressed.”⁶⁶¹⁰ Just one of many similar positive statements which the Commission ignored.

⁶⁶⁰⁶ Garnet Vincent Muller statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁶⁰⁷ Johannes Jaonus Uys Aurets statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁶⁰⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 44.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

On 7th August, 1965, Tsafendas reported to the Department of Labour in Durban, and asked for work as a “handyman storeman.”⁶⁶¹¹

During April and May, 1966, he applied to the Department of Labour for sick benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, and in all he received R56. In June of the same year an application for a further amount was refused since he had already received the full amount to which he was entitled.”⁶⁶¹²

On 25th May, 1966, he applied to the Department of Labour's employment officer for light work as a clerk or salesman or, alternatively, as an operator-welder or fitter. He was requested to submit a medical certificate to the effect that he was fit for work, but on 6th June, 1966, he again turned up without the required certificate. On 30th June he was referred to Chrysler (S.A.) Pty. Ltd., Elsie's River, for employment as an operator-welder, but was not employed.⁶⁶¹³

Another example of Tsafendas being portrayed in a bad light while any positives were ignored is his experience at the Department of Labour. Although the Report refers three times to this Department and Tsafendas's visits to it, there is no mention of the comments made by employees who interacted with him there. It is also stated that Tsafendas did not bring a medical certificate, which again tells only half of the story. Let us first see what the workers in this Department said which was omitted from the Report:

- Ian Boswell, administrative assistant at the Department of Labour. He interviewed ⁶⁶⁰⁹ Owen Smorenburg statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Leer W.D. 10/10/ 4102 oor Stafendas. NASA.

⁶⁶¹⁰ Redvers Wakfer statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub File: 1/5, Subject Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

⁶⁶¹¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 34.

⁶⁶¹² Chapter II C, Paragraph 59.

⁶⁶¹³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 62.

Tsafendas three times in 1966 and testified to the police that “he was at all times neatly dressed and never gave the impression of being destitute. Aside from being over-talkative, he showed no symptoms of abnormality during his interviews with me.”⁶⁶¹⁴

- Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys, employment officer at the Department of Labour, interviewed Tsafendas twice. He told the police that he “never got the impression that there was mentally anything wrong with him or that he acted abnormally.”⁶⁶¹⁵
- Gideon Cloete, also at the Department of Labour, interviewed Tsafendas twice. According to Cloete, Tsafendas “had a neat appearance and made a good impression.” He did not notice any “signs of abnormality” and “appeared totally normal” to him.⁶⁶¹⁶

Taken together, these three officers interviewed Tsafendas seven times. All said that he showed no signs of abnormality and Boswell and Cloete testified that he was neatly dressed. These were important statements as they clearly contradicted the State’s portrayal of Tsafendas at his summary trial, as a man of dirty and neglected appearance who suffered from schizophrenia, but they were omitted from the Report.

As for the medical certificate, the Report has manipulated a witness’s evidence on this matter in such a way as to portray Tsafendas in a distinctly negative light. Boswell did indeed state that Tsafendas failed to present such a document despite being asked to do so. However, Boswell also testified that “Tsafendas shortly after produced a certificate to the effect that he had been treated for a nasal complaint at Groote Schuur Hospital. This was accepted as a certificate of fitness and an application for Unemployment Benefits taken by myself.”⁶⁶¹⁷

From April 19, 1966 to May 15, 1966, Tsafendas was under the medical supervision of Dr. Leon Solomon at Groote Schuur Hospital suffering from “a deviated nasal septum and epistaxis,” and underwent surgery on his nose. Dr. Solomon during this period did not report any mental disability and found Tsafendas to be fit to return to his work at Marine Diamond

⁶⁶¹⁴ Ian James Murdock Boswell statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64. NASA.

⁶⁶¹⁵ Pieter Geldenhuys statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 1, Sub File: 1/1, Department of Labour. NASA.

⁶⁶¹⁶ Gideon Jacobus Cloete testimony at Tsafendas’s summary trial, 19 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, NASA.

⁶⁶¹⁷ Ian James Murdock Boswell statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64. NASA.

Corporation.⁶⁶¹⁸ Since Tsafendas was declared fit to return to work by Dr. Solomon just three weeks ago, naturally this certificate was deemed acceptable by Boswell.

The fact that Tsafendas was in possession of this certificate from May 17 means that he could easily have produced it for Boswell on June 6 and the likelihood is that he simply forgot to bring it. What is important is that the Commission was aware of the existence of the certificate from Dr. Solomon and aware that Tsafendas had given it to Boswell. However, it omitted these two facts, thus grossly misrepresenting the issue of the medical certificate and making it appear as if Tsafendas was unable to produce the document, implying that there was something wrong with his health.

Actually, Tsafendas was in possession of at least two medical certificates proving him fit for any work. These were from the two state doctors, Dr. C. Been⁶⁶¹⁹ and Dr. A.C. McDonald,⁶⁶²⁰ who examined him for his permanent residence application. This also suggests that Tsafendas probably forgot to bring the certificate on that specific occasion. The Commission was well aware of that, too, but did not find it necessary to mention it here or anywhere else in its Report.

MIKE'S OUTFITTERS

*In July, 1966, he entered into an agreement with Michaelis Augustides of Mike's Outfitters, Woodstock, by which he would receive commission on the purchases of crew members whom he brought to the shop. For this purpose, one of the shop assistants accompanied Tsafendas to the ship on a few occasions, and brought some of the crew members to the shop. In this way Tsafendas earned about R12.*⁶⁶²¹

Neville Judson was the shop assistant who accompanied Tsafendas to the ship, which was the Eleni. He said of Tsafendas that he "never in no way got the impression that he could

⁶⁶¹⁸ Dr. Leon Solomon's medical report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas, 7 June 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: 1/1 Departement van Arbeid. NASA; Medical certificate issued by Dr. Solomon for the Employment Insurance Act, 1946. 7 June 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: 1/1 Departement van Arbeid. NASA.

⁶⁶¹⁹ Demitrio Tsafendas medical certificate issued by Dr. Been for the Aliens Act, 1937. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

⁶⁶²⁰ Memorandum about the application for permanent residence in terms of the Aliens Act from Demetrio Tsafendas, drawn up by the Secretary for Immigration, n.d. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

⁶⁶²¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 77.

be mentally deranged. He appeared to be a normal man with normal reasoning powers.”⁶⁶²²
Judson's statement was not used by the Commission.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

Towards the end of June, or at the beginning of July, 1966, he went to the House of Assembly to enquire about a post as a messenger. He had most probably heard from other unemployed persons at the Department of Labour that he might be able to get a situation there.

On 18th July, 1966, he was summoned by the Chief Messenger, and after an interview with the Chief Messenger and two senior messengers he was notified in writing on 20th July, 1966, to report for duty on 1st August, 1966, at 7.45 a.m. He did so, and worked there until 6th September, 1966.

*Particulars of his engagement and the Commission's findings thereon are dealt with in Chapter X.*⁶⁶²³

*Neither the Chief Messenger nor the two senior messengers had any reason to believe, either during their interview or while Tsafendas was employed at the House of Assembly during August and September, that he was mentally disordered. Nor did the policemen and other messengers who came into contact with him at the House of Assembly notice anything wrong.*⁶⁶²⁴

The Commission has used Tsafendas's statement to the police as the source of how he heard about a possible job at the House of Assembly. However, he had lied. Many years later, in 1987, when he was in Pretoria Central Prison, Tsafendas described to a senior magistrate, Mr. T.I. Potgieter, how he got the job:

“One day I was sitting in front of the Assembly and I bought fish and chips from a Portuguese shop across the road... I sat on a bench and started throwing pieces to the seagulls... While I was doing that, somebody comes and sits next to me on the bench. He was a small man, dark, he says, ‘What are you doing here?’ I say to him, ‘Well, I'm doing nothing.’ He says to me, ‘Are you out of a job?’ I said, ‘Yes.’ He says to me, ‘Look, there is a part-time job here. Don't say I told you. Go there and tell them, inquire if you can get the ⁶⁶²² Neville Judson statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die ‘Eleni.’ NASA.

⁶⁶²³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 73.

⁶⁶²⁴ Chapter II C, Paragraph 74.

job, but don't say I sent you or told you about it.' So, I went there ..."⁶⁶²⁵

A few years later, Tsafendas repeated the story to Father Minas Constandinou, but with crucial detail added. He said that sometime, probably in July, he started observing the Parliament building to explore the possibility of assassinating Dr. Verwoerd. His preference was to kidnap him and exchange him for political prisoners, but he knew that would be impossible on his own. He had hoped that one day the common people would storm the building, as the French revolutionaries had done with the Bastille. He visited the place two or three times in a week but not every day, so as not to be noticed. He would sit on a bench and feed the birds while observing the building. One day, a man came out of the building and started talking to him, while he also fed the birds. They started talking about the birds and then Tsafendas told him he was unemployed. The man told him that he was a messenger and that the Parliament was desperate for messengers and he should apply for the position. He assured him he would be accepted as they were short-staffed. Tsafendas could not believe his luck. He went to the barber, had a haircut and shave, bought a new suit and attended the interview.⁶⁶²⁶ What happened in the interview and thereafter is discussed later in this chapter in the "House of Assembly" section.

HUME PIPE COMPANY

*During September and October, 1964, he worked for the Hume Pipe Company at Gondola, near Beira.*⁶⁶²⁷

*On 9th October, 1964, he re-entered Rhodesia at Umtali. In Umtali he tried to buy a farm, but since it appeared that he had no money, no transaction took place. He also said that the silver fillings in his teeth had been done in Russia. (To the Commission he stated that he had obtained these in Turkey.) Because he had no visa, he was declared an illegal immigrant, and deported to Mozambique on 10th October, 1964.*⁶⁶²⁸

The Commission here is in error as to when Tsafendas worked at the Hume Pipe Company. Lt. Col. van Wyk wrote in his report regarding Tsafendas's activities in Rhodesia ⁶⁶²⁵ Interview by Mr T.I. Potgieter, Senior Magistrate, Pretoria with Mr Demitriou Tsafendas at the Pretoria Central Prison on 20 October 1987. Correctional Services. File 80/0043, A123, Dimitrio Tsafendas, Vol 1. NASA.

⁶⁶²⁶ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶⁶²⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 17.

⁶⁶²⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 18.

and Mozambique: "From there he went directly to Gondola near Beira, where he was arrested by the Security Police of Mozambique because of subversive activities on 16.11.64 while he worked at Hume Pipe, Gondola."⁶⁶²⁹ In reality, the two above paragraphs of the Commission's Report would have been correct if they were the other way round, as Tsafendas got the job at Hume Pipe after he returned to Mozambique on October 10. This is evidently an innocent and unimportant mistake on behalf of Judge van Wyk since it makes no difference whether Tsafendas worked a month later or earlier at this company. However, it is indicative of the difficulties the Commission (and the author) faced in order correctly to reconstruct Tsafendas's life story based on thousands of documents and reports.

CONCLUSION

The Commission once again has misrepresented Tsafendas on the issue of employment and his ability properly to do a job. Several important facts are missing, for example the fact that he worked at Limasollu Naci College as a foreign language teacher for six months. This alone contradicted the claim that Tsafendas was unable to do more than a menial job, that he was unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, that his speech was disjointed and that he suffered from thought-disorder. Missing also are very positive comments about Tsafendas's character and working abilities. Tsafendas is described by most of his colleagues as a friendly, talkative, polite and intelligent worker, a total contradiction to the way he was described at his trial and by the Commission.

⁶⁶²⁹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

TSAFENDAS'S LANDLORDS AND FLATMATES

This section examines what the Commission has written about Tsafendas's landlords and flatmates. Their testimony is important because several of them spent a significant amount of time with him. The study examines what the Commission took from their testimonies and what was omitted from them.

TSAFENDAS'S ACCOMMODATION IN PRETORIA IN 1963

*After Tsafendas's arrival in Pretoria from Lourenço Marques, he stayed with his half-brother for a few days and then lived in rooms in various parts of the city.*⁶⁶³⁰

It is correct that Tsafendas stayed at his half-brother's house for a few days, but entirely incorrect that he "lived in rooms in various parts of the city." That claim was taken from Nick Vlachopoulos testimony to the Commission where he stated that Tsafendas "stayed in about 20 places in Pretoria."⁶⁶³¹ However, Tsafendas's step-mother, his two half-sisters and his half-brother, all told the Commission that Tsafendas "always had proper accommodation in Pretoria."⁶⁶³² The Commission itself wrote in its Report after interviewing the above members of Tsafendas's family that "after his stepmother had fetched him, he had stayed with his family for a while and then hired a room."⁶⁶³³ Judge van Wyk ignored the evidence of these witnesses in favour of the remark by Vlachopoulos.

The statement of Tsafendas's family was confirmed to the author by Katerina Pnema, his half-sister, Mary Eendracht, his first cousin who was in Pretoria at the time, and Fotini Gavasiadis, Vlachopoulos's sister. All of these witnesses told the author that after Tsafendas left his half-sister's house, he lived for a few weeks at Gavasiadi's house and for the remainder of the nine months he spent in Pretoria, he lived in a rent-free apartment provided by Nick Vlachopoulos (Gavasiadis's house was also owned by Vlachopoulos). Eendracht, Pnema and Gavasiadis agreed that Tsafendas never stayed anywhere else.⁶⁶³⁴

⁶⁶³⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 5

⁶⁶³¹ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁶³² COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁶³³ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁶³⁴ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

TSAFENDAS NOT PAYING PART OF THE RENT

*On 28th August, 1964, he went to stay at a boarding house in Beira, and there he was often seen with a Bible in his hand. On 8th October, 1964, he left Beira without having paid for part of his board and lodging.*⁶⁶³⁵

The above statement is correct, but by telling only half the story, it implies that Tsafendas fled to avoid paying his bill, and this was not the case. Stelios Marangos, the owner of the boarding house, testified to the police that Tsafendas “stayed at his lodgings from 28 August 1964 to 8 October 1964. He was unemployed and had only paid his lodgings for the period 28 August to 28 September. When he left, he said he was going to look for work at the firm that lays the pipeline from Beira to Rhodesia.”⁶⁶³⁶ Tsafendas had obviously told Marangos what his plans were and his landlord clearly did not view him as some kind of absconder.

According to Nick Papadakis, who lived in the boarding house, and Tsafendas's childhood friend Andreas Babiolakis, Tsafendas told Marangos that he would leave as soon as his money ran out, but Marangos insisted he should stay. When Tsafendas eventually left, his intention was to get a job on the Beira-Rhodesia pipeline, but instead he found work with the Hume Pipe Company in Gondola.⁶⁶³⁷ However, soon after he started there, he was arrested by the Portuguese Public Security Police and accused of preaching “under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique's independence.”⁶⁶³⁸

Tsafendas was kept in custody for three months before being freed on January 26, 1965.⁶⁶³⁹ He then managed to secure work as an interpreter at Beira docks, but he was ⁶⁶³⁵ Chapter II C, Paragraph 16.

⁶⁶³⁶ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁶³⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁶³⁸ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁶³⁹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA; Report of the COE. Chapter II C, Paragraph 19. December 1966. R.P. 16/1967. Pretoria.

dismissed for urging the Mozambican workers to strike in protest at their working conditions.⁶⁶⁴⁰ On March 5, 1965, he left Mozambique for Durban.⁶⁶⁴¹

It is not known to the author whether Tsafendas eventually gave Marangos what he owed him – his travels, incarcerations and periods of unemployment must have made contact difficult - but there is abundant evidence that Tsafendas always paid his debts. Peter Pappas, the owner of a café which Tsafendas frequented in Durban, said, “When his luck was out, I sometimes gave him a free meal, but when he started work he paid me.”⁶⁶⁴² One day, John Emmanuel Marvis, a Greek friend in Beira, lent Tsafendas twenty escudos and Tsafendas repaid him a few days later.⁶⁶⁴³ Some of his friends in Mozambique, including Costas Poriазis and Andreas and Giangos Babiolakis, voluntarily gave him money to travel from Beira to Durban. About a month later, Tsafendas paid back the money, even though they had insisted they did not want it back.⁶⁶⁴⁴

MRS. MANNING

*During October, 1965, he hired a room at No. 7, Prince Street, Vredehoek, from a Mrs. Manning. There his neighbours complained that he would come to fetch water in their kitchen and spill it on the floor, with the result that he was given notice to vacate the room.*⁶⁶⁴⁵

The above statement, made to the Commission by Manning, is correct, but the Report distorts the picture by omitting her opinion of Tsafendas. She testified in full that:

“He rented Room 3 next to the Ferreiras. It was a serviced room but I found him making his own bed. When he came to me he was well-dressed, well-spoken, and gave a good impression. I thought him to be a Greek. For a few weeks he attracted no unfavourable attention, until Mrs Ferreira came to me to complain that he was a nuisance. She said he was going into her kitchen to fetch water and that he was spilling water on the floor... During his ⁶⁶⁴⁰ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁶⁴¹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁶⁴² Rand Daily Mail, 14 September 1966, ‘Tsafendas: in the eyes of a friend.’

⁶⁶⁴³ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

⁶⁶⁴⁴ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Costas Poriазis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

⁶⁶⁴⁵ Chapter II C, Paragraph 45.

stay, I regularly inspected his room. I also spoke to him... From his general appearance, he appeared to be a businessman. When he paid me, he had a bundle of notes and I took him to be a man of means.”⁶⁶⁴⁶

It is clear that Manning was favourably impressed by Tsafendas; he made his own bed though he did not have to, he was well-spoken and dressed well. However all these positive comments are omitted from the Report and once again the only negative reference is recorded.

DURBAN MEN'S HOME

*On 21st June, 1965, he moved into the Durban Men's Home, Durban, where he lived until 24th August, 1965. At this home he expressed himself strongly against the South African Government and in favour of Communism.*⁶⁶⁴⁷

This part is examined in the “Political Activities and Ideology” section.

PATRICK O'RYAN

In Chapter II C, Paragraphs 47, 48, 55 and 56, Tsafendas's time at Patrick O'Ryan's house is mentioned. Tsafendas stayed at his house for about five months (November 1965-April 1966), and remained close to O'Ryan up to his arrest. Tsafendas considered O'Ryan the best person he ever met and the best friend he ever had. Although he stayed there for five months there and was very close to O'Ryan and his family, only limited information is used from his statement.

During his time off he also stayed with Mr. O'Ryan. He never paid the O'Ryans any board.

*Mr. O'Ryan never gained the impression that there was anything seriously wrong with him. He did tell them, though, about the tapeworm which he was supposed to have. Sometimes he called it a snake, and said that he had to feed it constantly.*⁶⁶⁴⁸

⁶⁶⁴⁶ Violet Irene Manning statement to the COE, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse polisie. NASA.

⁶⁶⁴⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 32.

⁶⁶⁴⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 55.

*According to Patrick O'Ryan, Tsafendas was strongly opposed to the policies of the Governments of South Africa and Portugal.*⁶⁶⁴⁹

Patrick O'Ryan, who knew Tsafendas better than the other witnesses and considered him to be his best friend, a feeling Tsafendas reciprocated, made several positive statements about his character, but none of them was mentioned in the Report, while the fact that he did not pay any board was included. It is true that Tsafendas did not pay for his board. However, he frequently bought food for the household and toys and sweets for the children. When O'Ryan asked Tsafendas not to do this because he thought it made him look bad, Tsafendas continued to bring food and sweets but told the children they were bought by their dad and himself. Young Reuben O'Ryan, a son of Patrick, said about Tsafendas, "We all loved him ... he was an adorable man ... he was the answer to our prayers. We were poor and he brought food to our house."⁶⁶⁵⁰

Patrick O'Ryan had testified that he had formed a "deep liking" for Tsafendas and that he "had confidence in him... He was a very kindly man. In my experience of him he had a good heart... I never got the impression that something was wrong in his mind," or that he "was mentally disturbed." He also found him to be "well-spoken and had good vocabulary."⁶⁶⁵¹ None of these is included in the Report.

O'Ryan had also testified that Tsafendas "was against the state policy of both South Africa and Portugal" and that he "labelled the apartheid policies as unfair."⁶⁶⁵² He later described Tsafendas as getting "excited" when he talked about politics and saying that Dr. Verwoerd was a tyrant who was oppressing his people, that he was "Hitler's best student" and that if he (Tsafendas) ever get hold of him "he would bash his skull." O'Ryan did not tell the police about Dr. Verwoerd being a tyrant or about bashing his skull as he believed it would be bad for Tsafendas.⁶⁶⁵³ For more about O'Ryan and his relationship with Tsafendas see his testimony at the summary trial chapter. The Report's comment that O'Ryan did not ⁶⁶⁴⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 56.

⁶⁶⁵⁰ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Reuben O' Ryan in a personal interview, 15 April 2016; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶⁶⁵¹ Patrick O' Ryan testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁶⁵² Patrick O' Ryan testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁶⁵³ Patrick O'Ryan in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

think that there was something seriously wrong with Tsafendas is discussed in the 'Mental State' section of this chapter.

MRS. GROVES

*In April, 1966, he moved in as a boarder with Mrs. E. M. Groves at No. 57, Milton Road, Observatory, Cape Town, but because the other boarders were dissatisfied with his behaviour, he was asked to leave the boarding-house.*⁶⁶⁵⁴

The above statement is correct, but it is misleading because once again important information has been omitted. Firstly, it is not revealed that Groves was a former nurse in a psychiatric hospital and therefore experienced with schizophrenics. Tsafendas boarded with her for six to seven weeks and her opinion of him was bound to be scientifically more acceptable than that of the non-medic Johnston who spoke to Tsafendas for all of twenty minutes. His opinion about Tsafendas's mental state is included in the Report, hers is not. Referencing her professional experience, Mrs. Groves said of Tsafendas, "He was completely normal. I was a nurse and worked in lunatic institutions. He was a normal person to the best of my knowledge."⁶⁶⁵⁵

It is true that the other boarders were unhappy with aspects of Tsafendas's behaviour, but the Commission fails to say why. According to Mrs. Groves' statement: "D. Tsafendas was a very good eater. He mastered many languages and behaved properly. Besides his rough table manners, I have nothing against him. He was completely normal. I received complaints that he was argumentative and towards me he said that we Afrikaners are a backward nation. It was clear that he had nothing good towards Afrikaners. For the sake of my other tenants, I asked him to leave my place."⁶⁶⁵⁶

Jacobus Bornman, Tsafendas's roommate at Mrs. Groves's house, testified that "Tsafendas's conversations were always about women and politics. He never talked about anything else. Tsafendas was dissatisfied with conditions in R.S.A and he has often criticized the government, his exact words I don't remember, but it seemed to me that he had a grudge ⁶⁶⁵⁴ Chapter II C, Paragraph 58.

⁶⁶⁵⁵ Elizabeth Magdalene Groves statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁶⁵⁶ Elizabeth Magdalene Groves statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

against Dr. Verwoerd. He stood up a lot for the Coloureds.”⁶⁶⁵⁷ Thus, the dissatisfaction with Tsafendas was apparently due to his argumentativeness and his antipathy towards Afrikaners, something he never hid. However, by not revealing the reason for the boarders’ dissatisfaction, the Commission leaves the reader with the wrong idea, that it was probably because of his mental state or his aggression.

JACOBUS BORNMAN

*Mr. Bornman, who occupied the same room as Tsafendas, stated that Tsafendas did not show any signs of being mentally abnormal. He was good-natured, but had messy habits. His topics, of conversation were politics and women. He was strongly opposed to the policy of the Government. He read only English-language newspapers and was sometimes upset by what he had read. At times he passed the remark that the Government was doing so much for the Coloureds that it would be better for him to be a Coloured.*⁶⁶⁵⁸

Bornman was Tsafendas’s roommate in Mrs. Groves’s house for six to seven weeks. The above comment about Tsafendas being ‘good-natured’ is the only wholly positive statement about Tsafendas in the entire Report. Although the Commission allowed two positive comments from Bornman – that Tsafendas was good natured and showed no signs of mental abnormality – they seem meagre in comparison with what was missing. The most important omission was that Tsafendas voluntarily gave money to Bornman and then refused to take it back. Bornman said about the incident: “on one occasion I had no money and then Tsafendas gave me five cents. I later wanted to return the money to him, but he would not take it.”⁶⁶⁵⁹

This is hardly something a beggar would do, and Tsafendas is described by the Commission as a beggar, always asking for help and money, taking advantage of people and never thanking anyone for what they did for him. The omission is not unexpected. To include this example of his generosity would have raised questions as to whether Tsafendas was really the sort of hopeless person that emerged from the summary trial.

⁶⁶⁵⁷ Jacobus Johannes Bornman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁶⁵⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 58.

⁶⁶⁵⁹ Jacobus Johannes Bornman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Bornman had also characterised Tsafendas as “a friendly and plausible person,” adding that, “during the time I lived with Tsafendas, his behaviour was normal... I regarded him as a normal and very intelligent person... According to my observation, Tsafendas was a gentle person. He was neat on his person, but his eating habits were not up to scratch. He was messy.” That the Commission omitted the comment about Tsafendas’s intelligence is not that important as even the psychiatrists testified to his intelligence at the trial, along with several other witnesses. However, in stating that Tsafendas had “messy habits,” the Commission is guilty of a misleading generalisation. Bornman used the word “messy” to refer to Tsafendas’s eating habits and not to his general appearance and behaviour. In fact he said that Tsafendas was a neat person. This omission is important as Tsafendas was portrayed in the summary trial as a dirty person with dirty clothes; not at all the same as being merely a messy eater.

In its totality, Bornman’s statement was one of the most positive about Tsafendas. However, by its selective evisceration, the Commission managed to downplay it significantly. Bornman’s comments regarding Tsafendas’s ideology are examined in the section ‘Political Activities and Ideology’ of this chapter.

MRS. SCOTT

During June and July, 1966, he had his meals with Mrs. Scott at No. 42, Chamberlain Street, Woodstock. There he acquired the nickname of “The Pig” on account of his bad table manners. In her opinion he was normal. On one occasion he passed the following remarks in Mrs. Scott’s presence when a possible job in South West Africa was mentioned:

I cannot go to South West Africa. I have a job to do here before I go back.

He told one of the boarders that he had obtained a position in South West Africa, but that he would first take a post at the Houses of Parliament for two months.⁶⁶⁶⁰

Mary Cathleen Scott was Greek, married to a White South African. She often cooked Greek food and many Greeks would visit her house to eat.⁶⁶⁶¹ Scott told the police that Tsafendas was “very poorly mannered” and she named him “The Pig,” but she “never got the ⁶⁶⁶⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 67.

⁶⁶⁶¹ Panagiotis Peroglou in a personal interview, 6 June 2016.

impression that he could be mentally unbalanced,” indeed she thought that he “appeared to be perfectly normal.”⁶⁶⁶²

Pamela Abrahams, a South African, often visited Scott's house to eat, along with her Greek boyfriend and future husband, Panagiotis Peroglou. She said Tsafendas was very well mannered, especially with women. Neither she nor her boyfriend recalled him having bad manners or being nicknamed “The Pig” by Scott. In fact, according to Abrahams, “Tsafendas was a gentleman. He would always get up from the table to greet you and he always offered you his seat or went to find you a seat... he was certainly very well mannered.”⁶⁶⁶³

Panagiotis Peroglou was a good friend of Scott but he does not remember that she ever complained about Tsafendas's manners or called him a pig. He was very surprised to hear such comments, with which he disagreed. Peroglou remembers Tsafendas as being “very well mannered, especially with women and elderly people...” he was “very talkative and friendly” and “he had a lot of respect for the women. He would bring them a chair or he would offer his chair.” Peroglou said Tsafendas was “well educated, especially about Greece's history and Christianity.”⁶⁶⁶⁴ Peroglou and Abrahams associated with Tsafendas for about three months and Peroglou said they “never got the impression that he might be insane. He never did or said anything to make us think he was insane. He was definitely sane.” The couple do not remember Tsafendas talking politics.⁶⁶⁶⁵ Peroglou was questioned by the police but his statement was not found in the archives. There is no mention of him in the Report.

Elias Constantaras, another Greek who knew Tsafendas very well, was also friendly with Scott and often ate at her house. He was surprised to hear that she called Tsafendas a pig and says she never did so in front of him. He does not remember Tsafendas's eating habits and thinks if they were so bad, he would have remembered. What he did remember was Scott complaining to him two or three times that Tsafendas talked politics persistently at the table in front of her boarders and she suspected him of being a Communist. According to Constantaras, Scott was afraid of Tsafendas talking in that way and she asked him to tell ⁶⁶⁶² Mary Cathleen Scott statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁶⁶³ Pamela Abrahams in a personal interview, 6 June 2016.

⁶⁶⁶⁴ Panagiotis Peroglou in a personal interview, 6 June 2016.

⁶⁶⁶⁵ Pamela Abrahams and Panagiotis Peroglou in a personal interview, 6 June 2016.

Tsafendas to stop. Constantaras did so and though Tsafendas was not happy that Scott did not tell him herself, he complied with her request.⁶⁶⁶⁶

Constantaras remembers Tsafendas discoursing on history. "He knew a lot about Greek and world history." Tsafendas "was anti-colonialist and anti-apartheid; he described Dr. Verwoerd as 'Nazi' and 'Hitler's best student' and the white South Africans as Nazis. He [Tsafendas] believed that Dr. Verwoerd was doing to the Blacks what the Nazis did to the Jews."⁶⁶⁶⁷ Constantaras and Peroglou were questioned by the police but their statement were not found in the archives.

Stratis Vamvarapis, another Greek, lodged with Mrs Scott at the same time as Tsafendas and knew him for about a year. He found Tsafendas to be a "strange man - strange as a character, not mentally strange. He was very argumentative and was getting easily crossed when he disagreed with people." Initially, Tsafendas had little to say, but became more talkative as they grew to know each other, though he never discussed politics with him. Tsafendas never appeared to be schizophrenic or insane and he never heard him mention a tapeworm. He recalls him eating a lot but does not remember if his manners were messy and he never heard Mary Scott call Tsafendas "The Pig."⁶⁶⁶⁸

MRS. THEYSER

*He left Mrs. De Vos's house on 30th June, 1966, and moved into a room with Mrs. Theyser at No. 48, Devon Street, Woodstock. There he was also given notice and left on 30th August, 1966.*⁶⁶⁶⁹

Theyser had also testified that she "never got the impression in any way that he might be mentally unbalanced. To me he appeared a quite normal person."⁶⁶⁷⁰ As usual, the Commission omitted this positive statement.

⁶⁶⁶⁶ Elias Constantaras in a personal interview, 11 April 2015.

⁶⁶⁶⁷ Elias Constantaras in a personal interview, 11 April 2015.

⁶⁶⁶⁸ Stratis Vamvarapis in a personal interview, 31 May 2016.

⁶⁶⁶⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 66.

⁶⁶⁷⁰ Alice Mary Theyser statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

CONCLUSION

Tsafendas is portrayed by the Commission as a bad lodger in many ways. Although some of the issues mentioned are true, the overall portrayal is inaccurate. The Commission omitted all the positive remarks about him, including those about his character and his mental state, but included anything remotely denigratory. The most important omissions are those about Tsafendas's personality, especially the comments made by Bornman and by O'Ryan. Finally, a word on the language the Commission invariably employs when it describes Tsafendas or his activities: this is probably best described as verging on the contemptuous.

TSAFENDAS'S HOSPITALIZATIONS AND MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS

The Report refers extensively to Tsafendas's hospitalizations and the medical examinations he underwent throughout his life. Let us examine what was included in the Report and what was omitted.

TSAFENDAS'S FIRST HOSPITALIZATION

*While in detention in the United States of America, Tsafendas showed symptoms of mental disorder and was admitted to the Boston Psychopathic Hospital.*⁶⁶⁷¹

This is the first reference to Tsafendas being hospitalized and the first to refer to "mental disorder." What is significant is that his symptoms occurred "while in detention." The experience of mental disorder while incarcerated will recur many times in Tsafendas's story, becoming almost a trademark in his life. Although Tsafendas manages his workaday life perfectly well and no-one notices anything wrong with him, whenever he is arrested, he appears to suffer from mental problems and is quickly released. In later life, Tsafendas declared openly that he faked madness in order to be released, and this claim is validated by the records. For example:

In January 1952, Tsafendas was arrested in Lisbon after security reports from Lourenço Marques advised the Portuguese authorities that he was a half-caste, a Communist and an anti-colonialist under suspicion of "unclear activities" during his time in Mozambique.⁶⁶⁷² "During his interrogations he gave signs of having some sort of mental disability, which was confirmed by the Hospital do Ultramar." He was subsequently released.⁶⁶⁷³

In November 1964, in Mozambique, Tsafendas was arrested by the Portuguese Public Security Police and accused of preaching "under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique's independence..."⁶⁶⁷⁴ He was detained in police cells for fourteen days in the custody of Inspector Horacio Ferreira, who testified to the South African police that

⁶⁶⁷¹ Chapter II B, Paragraph 3

⁶⁶⁷² Diario Popular, 9 September 1966, 'E conhesido em Lisboa o assassino do Dr. Verwoerd.'

⁶⁶⁷³ PIDE Report regarding Tsafendas, 5 May 1956. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁶⁷⁴ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

Tsafendas was “normal” and he regarded him “as a very intelligent person.”⁶⁶⁷⁵ After two weeks, due to the seriousness of the charges and because of Tsafendas’s police record, he was handed to the PIDE for further interrogation. He spent the next two and half months in detention, interrogated regularly by PIDE. There, suffering from a harsh regime of imprisonment and interrogation, Tsafendas again showed “symptoms of mental illness” and was released.⁶⁶⁷⁶

Furthermore, each time he is arrested in the United States for contravening the immigration laws, the result is the same. Yet only three of the two hundred witnesses who were interviewed by the Commission and the police about Tsafendas expressed doubts as to his sanity as a free man. Surely this should have rung alarm bells with the Commission.

GRAFTON STATE HOSPITAL REPORT⁶⁶⁷⁷

The Commission includes several extracts from the report of this hospital, including statements which Tsafendas made to the doctors to convince them that he was mad. Most importantly, it repeats the following crucially important reference from the Grafton report:

Tsafendas's faking mental illness

“... he faked mental illness because he was afraid to ship out because of the numerous leakings of ships.”⁶⁶⁷⁸

That Tsafendas had pretended mental illness at least once is a hugely important revelation. Yet it is reproduced in the Report as a run-of-the-mill observation of no particular relevance. Assuming the Commission felt the question of his deceit could not be ignored, it nevertheless offered no comment or elaboration and posed no questions. Did the Commission not ask Tsafendas about the incident?

More important is why this information was not used at the summary trial. The Grafton document must have been given to the State by the police as it was also given to the ⁶⁶⁷⁵ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, File 1/5. FILE Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

⁶⁶⁷⁶ Letter of Francisco Bartolomeu da Costa Lontrão to the Subdirector of the PIDE in Lourenço Marques, 19 January 1965. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Alberto Henriques de Matos Rodrigues conclusion to the Subdirector, 23 January 1965. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁶⁷⁷ Chapter II B, Paragraph 10.

⁶⁶⁷⁸ Chapter II B, Paragraph 10.

Commission. Surely, the fact that Tsafendas had faked mental illness in the past was worth raising at the trial, where the defence was claiming he was mentally ill and the State was supposedly trying to prove otherwise. Would not such information have been extremely useful to those who examined Tsafendas, had they known of it?

This was not the only time Tsafendas simulated illness to get out of trouble, and the police and presumably the Commission, knew it. At least six witnesses from the Eleni tanker testified to the South African police on the 12th of October that Tsafendas had told them he faked mental illness to avoid call-up into the Portuguese army.⁶⁶⁷⁹ Tsafendas had told the same thing to several other witnesses though they were not questioned by the South African police.

However, the fact that Tsafendas was exempted from serving in the Portuguese army was known to the South African police because it was mentioned in PIDE's reports. No reason was given for Tsafendas's exemption, but it would have been very easy for the Commission to find out. Exemption from service in the Portuguese army was granted only to persons with physical or mental defects. Since Tsafendas was not physically defective, the Commission must have deduced that his exemption was due to reasons concerning his mental state. No mention of this incident is made in the Report.

Evidence of a different sort of malingering by Tsafendas came from Antony Maw, the former Honorary Consul for Greece in Lourenço Marques. He told the South African police when he was questioned on the 7th of September that Tsafendas had claimed "illness" when he was not allowed to disembark from a ship on arrival in Lourenço Marques.⁶⁶⁸⁰ Maw's statement was found in the archives and therefore it was known to the Commission, but no mention of this incident appears in its Report. Several witness told the author that on the occasion Maw referred to, Tsafendas pretended to be suffering from appendicitis so as to be taken off the ship to a hospital in Lourenço Marques.

It is clear that Tsafendas had thought this through. It would not have helped him to pretend madness since the probability was that he would be banned from landing. However, with an apparent acute appendicitis, it was likely he would be rushed to a hospital ashore.

⁶⁶⁷⁹ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁶⁸⁰ Antony Maw statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub File: 1/8. NASA

Although Maw does not specify the illness claimed by Tsafendas, his appendicitis trick was known to almost every Greek in Lourenço Marques and it seems highly unlikely that the Commission and the South African police did not hear about it. No fewer than seven Greeks who were interviewed by the author Andreas Babiolakis, Mary Eendracht, Helen Grispos, Ira Kyriakakis, George Liberopoulos, Nick Papadakis and Katerina Pnema - knew the story and said that most if not all of the city's Greek population knew it, too.⁶⁶⁸¹

The hearing of voices

The Commission's Report also contains extracts from the Grafton Hospital report regarding Tsafendas's diagnosis, including a statement that "he hears voices coming through the radiators." The psychiatrists at the summary trial asked Tsafendas if he heard voices. Tsafendas replied in the negative, knowing full well that hearing voices was often used by people pretending to be crazy. When Tsafendas claimed to hear voices in the radiators it was 1946 and he had little knowledge or experience of hospitals. Years later, he told Father Minas Constandinou that the first times he was hospitalized he pretended to hear religious voices like "Joan of Arc." However, he was found to be lying by the psychiatrists and thereafter adopted something different - the tapeworm. He said "everyone hears voices or pretends to be Napoleon, but who would ever suspect anyone who believes he has a tapeworm?"⁶⁶⁸² He never used the voices trick again.

TSAFENDAS'S HOSPITALIZATION IN HAMBURG

*At the beginning of 1954 he was treated at the Tropen Krankenhaus in Hamburg for a stomach complaint. According to documents received from Germany, he alleged at that time that his trouble was due to a tapeworm. He is said to have claimed that the worm had been troubling him since 1937. No such worm was found and he was discharged.*⁶⁶⁸³

⁶⁶⁸¹ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 May 2016; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; George Liberopoulos in a personal interview, 6 July 2014; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 29 March 2015.

All of the above witnesses, apart from Father Minas, were living at the time in Mozambique and heard about it. Father Minas was told about it by Tsafendas himself in the mid-1990s. Henk van Woerden in the Mouthful of Glass also describes the same scene (2000: 70), presumably because he was told about it by Tsafendas.

⁶⁶⁸² Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶⁶⁸³ Chapter II B, Paragraphs 25.

*On 11th February, 1955, Demitrios Tsafandakis was admitted to the psychiatric section of the Ochsensall Hospital, Germany. The diagnosis was "mixed psychoneurosis psychosis." In the copious notes the hospital made at that time, his allegation that he had a tapeworm was mentioned repeatedly. He is said to have alleged that the worm caused stomach-ache, and that he could hear it at times. During February, 1955, he also attempted suicide by swallowing twenty sleeping-pills. A priest of the sect to which he belonged, an American, visited him at the above-mentioned hospital. This visitor told one of the doctors that Tsafendas had deserted during the war, hardly ever worked, wandered from country to country and that he did not trust him. On 6th June, 1955, he was discharged from the hospital. Apparently the paranoiac ideas had ceased.*⁶⁶⁸⁴

While all the above information is correct, it tells only half the truth. On each occasion, Tsafendas admitted himself to the hospital, including when he allegedly attempted to commit suicide. The issue of the suicide has been examined extensively in the previous chapter, and would not be discussed here again. There is a big difference between someone walking into a hospital complaining that he is ill and seeking admission, and being taken there by others who have detected a health problem. The fact that Tsafendas personally presented himself at these hospitals is not mentioned in the Report, though surely this was something that would arouse curiosity in any investigator.

A further point is that Tsafendas was diagnosed as suffering from, and treated for, depression, not schizophrenia. This, too, goes unmentioned in the Commission's Report. Two concluding diagnoses made at the Hamburg hospital: Dr. Bieser, a senior physician, labelled Tsafendas's condition as "mixed – pictured phasic psychose,"⁶⁶⁸⁵ and Dr. Nachtwey, a psychiatrist, diagnosed "endogenous depression, mixed-picture."⁶⁶⁸⁶

TSAFENDAS'S MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS FOR HIS PERMANENT RESIDENCE APPLICATION

In his application for permanent residence Tsafendas stated, inter alia, that he had been a sailor during the previous five years, that he had never before applied for permanent residence in South Africa, that he had never been deported from any country, and that he did not suffer from any mental disease. A medical certificate stating, inter alia, that he was not in *any way mentally defective was attached to his application.*⁶⁶⁸⁷

⁶⁶⁸⁴ Chapter II B, Paragraphs 26.

⁶⁶⁸⁵ Dr Bieser and Dr Schmidt-Janssen report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

⁶⁶⁸⁶ Medical Bulletin of Dimitrio Tsafendas, 6 June 1955. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

The above information is correct, but omits the fact that Tsafendas had been examined by two state doctors and issued with two medical certificates stating that he was perfectly fine, physically and mentally. This was known to the Commission. On November 11, 1963, Tsafendas was seen by Dr. C. Been and was found “not to be mentally or physically defective in any way,” and “generally in a good state of health.”⁶⁶⁸⁸ On November 14, 1963, Tsafendas was examined again in reference to his residence application by Dr. A.C. McDonald, who wrote “a favourable report.” A certificate for permanent residence was subsequently issued based in part on the two doctors’ reports.⁶⁶⁸⁹ If Tsafendas was as described by the medical experts in the summary trial – unable to follow a conversation for more than fifteen minutes, with disjointed speech and blocked thoughts - would not one or both of these two doctors have noticed?

SOUTH AFRICAN RAILWAYS AND HARBOURS

On 16th March, 1965, he was employed by the South African Railways and Harbours as a shed attendant at R90 per month. He was examined medically and nothing was found to be wrong with him.

*In a written statement in connection with this examination he stated, inter alia, that he had never had any nervous or mental disease.*⁶⁶⁹⁰

This is one of ten times that Tsafendas was medically examined between November 1963 and September 1966 and found to be perfectly healthy. He withholds the fact that he has been hospitalized several times and that he has a “fixation with a tapeworm.” Obviously, Tsafendas knew he would not get the job if he mentioned anything of the sort. Although only eighteen months into the future Tsafendas would be declared a schizophrenic with serious thought disorder, such a condition was not spotted by the doctor who examined him for the railways position.

⁶⁶⁸⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 3.

⁶⁶⁸⁸ Demitrio Tsafendas medical certificate issued by Dr. Been for the Aliens Act, 1937. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

⁶⁶⁸⁹ Memorandum about the application for permanent residence in terms of the Aliens Act from Demetrio Tsafendas, drawn up by the Secretary for Immigration, n.d. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

⁶⁶⁹⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 26.

It is important to mention here that Garnet Muller, Tsafendas's supervisor at this job, had given a statement to the police which was in the Commission's possession. Muller had "observed Tsafendas to possess intelligence above that of the average person who is likely to accept a position with the little responsibility which is attached to that of shed attendant."⁶⁶⁹¹ Once again, a positive statement about Tsafendas is omitted.

DR. KOSSEW'S EXAMINATION

*On 17th June he was examined by Dr. Kossew, the district surgeon, whose finding was that he was suffering from a serious form of schizophrenia.*⁶⁶⁹²

The Report goes into great detail about Tsafendas's other medical examinations, but here simply states that he was diagnosed as suffering from a serious form of schizophrenia. It offers no further information about Dr. Kossew's examination. Once again, the Commission has omitted significant information, most importantly why Tsafendas was examined by Dr. Kossew, a district surgeon, not a psychiatrist. On February 3, 1967, the same question was asked in the House of Assembly by MP J.O.N. Thompson. The Minister of Social Welfare and Pensions replied that "Tsafendas applied for a veteran's pension. As he was under sixty years old, evidence was required in terms of section 3 of the War Veterans' Pension Act, 1962, that he was unable, owing to infirmity of mind or body, to undertake regular work." The Minister said that although Tsafendas was diagnosed as schizophrenic and therefore was eligible for the pension, his application was eventually rejected "on the grounds that he had not rendered war service as defined in the Act."⁶⁶⁹³

This explanation as to why Tsafendas was examined by the district surgeon was important and should not have been omitted from the Report. Tsafendas had to be found unfit to do any work in order to qualify for the pension and that is how he was judged. However, as we have seen, whenever Tsafendas wanted to be found fit to work, he always proved to be so. On at least three occasions in the previous two years (Marine Diamond Corporation, City Tramways and South African Railways), he was examined by doctors and pronounced fit for the work he was seeking. He was also found to be perfectly healthy when examined by Dr.

⁶⁶⁹¹ Garnet Vincent Muller statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁶⁹² Chapter II C, Paragraph 69.

⁶⁶⁹³ House of Assembly, Question No. 17. 3 February 1967. K150, Vol. 12, File: Social Welfare and Pensions, NASA.

Been and Dr. A.C. McDonald for his residence permit.⁶⁶⁹⁴ This must have been spotted by the Commission and is most likely why the information about this examination was omitted. It is possible that the Commission failed to make the connection between the examinations. However the fact that Tsafendas was found perfectly sane and capable of working when he wanted to be so found, but the exact opposite when he wished to be ruled incapable must have struck the Commission as strange, at the least.

The Commission also omits significant information about the actual examination, for example the fact that it lasted only “a little bit longer” than ten minutes, and that Dr. Kossew arrived at his diagnosis simply by accepting what Tsafendas told him.⁶⁶⁹⁵ It also fails to state that Dr. Kossew made the diagnosis of schizophrenia after Tsafendas told him that in the house where he lived people were being killed off by poisoned food, a remark the doctor took for an illusion. However that meant that Tsafendas at the time nurtured two delusions: that he had a tapeworm inside him and people were being murdered by food poisoning. As Professors Alban Burke and Tuviah Zabow and Mr. van Zyl told the author, professional opinion held that it was almost impossible for a person to have two delusions at the same time.⁶⁶⁹⁶ The weaknesses of this diagnosis must have been evident to anyone who had studied the case or followed the summary trial, yet the Commission failed to raise any questions and simply stated the bald facts in its Report.

The reliability of Dr. Kossew's examination is considered in detail in the Summary Trial Chapter and will not be discussed again here. For more about that subject see the comments on Dr. Kossew's testimony in the chapter mentioned above.

⁶⁶⁹⁴ Memorandum about the application for permanent residence in terms of the Aliens Act from Demetrio Tsafendas, drawn up by the Secretary for Immigration, n.d. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

⁶⁶⁹⁵ Dr. Ralph Kossew testimony at Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966: 88. K150, Vol. 10, File: Union of S.A. NASA.

⁶⁶⁹⁶ Professor Alban Burke in a personal interview, 4 April 2016; Professor Tuviah Zabow in a personal interview, 11 April 2016; Reyner van Zyl in a personal interview, 10 April 2016.

OTHER MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS OF TSAFENDAS INCLUDED IN THE REPORT

*On 16th March, 1965, he was employed by the South African Railways and Harbours as a shed attendant at R90 per month. He was examined medically and nothing was found to be wrong with him. In a written statement in connection with this examination he stated, inter alia, that he had never had any nervous or mental disease.*⁶⁶⁹⁷

*On 12th November, 1965, he applied for a position as a bus conductor with City Tramways, Cape Town. Once again he was examined medically and nothing was found to be wrong with him. He stated, inter alia, that he had never had a nervous breakdown.*⁶⁶⁹⁸

*In February, 1966, he was treated at Groote Schuur Hospital for an obstruction in the nose and for nose bleeding. In April, he had a nose operation. He was in- hospital from 18th to 22nd April, 1966, and on 17th May, 1966, he was declared to be cured.*⁶⁶⁹⁹

*The next place where he sought employment was the Marine Diamond Corporation in Cape Town. On 13th January, 1966, he was examined by this company's medical officer and nothing was found to be wrong with him. Once again he declared that he had never had any mental or nervous disease.*⁶⁷⁰⁰

*Dr. S. Michelson, a specialist physician, examined Tsafendas in the Neurology Department of Groote Schuur Hospital on 3rd June, 1966. Tsafendas told him that he was unable to find any employment, and attributed this to his headaches and the fact that he was a "Jack of all trades." In addition to headaches, he complained of dizziness and a poor memory. The physician found that no serious, organic defect was perceptible in the nervous system, and considered the headaches to be "of migrainous nature."*⁶⁷⁰¹

The Commission has included in its Report some of Tsafendas's medical checks, especially those which took place in connection with his job applications. These examinations could not be ignored since everyone knew that a job-seeker needed to be medically examined and found fit in order to secure employment with those companies. If these examinations had not been mentioned, a major question would have arisen as to how Tsafendas, a schizophrenic, managed to get work and whether he was examined.

⁶⁶⁹⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 33.

⁶⁶⁹⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 49.

⁶⁶⁹⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 60.

⁶⁷⁰⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 53.

⁶⁷⁰¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 64.

Furthermore, the above examinations give birth to the question: How did none of these doctors notice that Tsafendas could not function on a reasonable level, was unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, suffered from thought-disorder and spoke in a disjointed manner, as evidence at the trial claimed? It is evident that Tsafendas was found physically and mentally healthy when he needed to be, as with his two medical examinations for permanent residence status. However, those mentioned above were not the only times Tsafendas was medically examined and found to be perfectly healthy.

MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS OF TSAFENDAS OMITTED FROM THE REPORT

As we have seen, the Commission omitted from its Report the two examinations in connection with Tsafendas's application for permanent residence. It also failed to note the following five medical checks, taking the total of omissions to seven:

- Dr. Been, the doctor who examined him for his permanent residence applications later examined Tsafendas again “for burns on his body whilst employed at Pooles” in 1964. Nothing about his mental state was noted.⁶⁷⁰²
- On September 25, 1965, he was examined by Dr. G.C. Baker and nothing was reported about his mental state.⁶⁷⁰³
- On April 18, 19 and May 3, 1966 Tsafendas was examined by Dr. Goldman, a consultant ear, nose and throat surgeon. He reported nothing about his mental condition.⁶⁷⁰⁴
- From April 19, 1966 to May 15, 1966, Tsafendas was under the medical supervision of Dr. Leon Solomon at Groote Schuur Hospital, suffering from “a deviated nasal septum and epistaxis,” and underwent surgery on his nose. Dr. Solomon during this period did not report any mental disability and found Tsafendas to be fit to return to his work.⁶⁷⁰⁵
- Finally, Dr. Darby, a casualty officer, examined Tsafendas on the evening of the assassination but did not report anything to be wrong about his mental state.⁶⁷⁰⁶

⁶⁷⁰² Dr. Been statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁷⁰³ Dr. G.C. Baker Statement re: Demitrio Tsafendas. GS.H. 65/014-181. No date. K150, Vol. 6, File: 4, NASA.

⁶⁷⁰⁴ I. Eisenberg Statement. RE: Demitrio Tsafendas. GS.H. 65/014-181. N.d. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁷⁰⁵ Dr. Leon Solomon's medical report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas, 7 June 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: 1/1 Departement van Arbeid. NASA; Medical certificate issued by Dr. Solomon for the Employment Insurance Act, 1946. 7 June 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: 1/1 Departement van Arbeid. NASA.

⁶⁷⁰⁶ Dr. T.A. Darby. Statement re: Demitrio Tsafendas. G.S.H. NO. 65/014-181, 6 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

Tsafendas's Hospitalization in Beira

Another of Tsafendas's hospitalizations not mentioned in the Report or at the summary trial is that at the Government Hospital in Beira in 1964. The Commission was aware of this development since Tsafendas had mentioned it to the police in his statement of the 19th of September⁶⁷⁰⁷ and Lt.-Colonel P.J.B. van Wyk also noted it in his report. Furthermore, Col. van Wyk had then taken the "necessary steps" and "formally applied" to obtain a copy of Tsafendas's medical report covering this hospitalization.⁶⁷⁰⁸ It must have been a simple formality to obtain the document since the Portuguese authorities had provided all of Tsafendas's medical reports from Portugal, and by then it would have been in the possession of the South African police. However, the author cannot know for a fact whether Lt.-Col van Wyk eventually received the report as no other reference to it was found in the national archives.

This hospitalization was important since it was the last time Tsafendas was admitted for a mental condition before he was arrested. Given that the South African authorities contacted hospitals in the United States for Tsafendas's records during the 1940s and in Europe for details of those in the 1950s, it is natural they contacted Beira, too. It was his most recent hospitalization and it must have been the easiest to contact since it was in Mozambique. The Portuguese authorities had happily shared with the South African police Tsafendas's medical records from his time in Portugal. They would surely have seen no problem providing one from Mozambique.

However, no mention of the hospitalization is made in the Commission's report. A clue might be found in the circumstances surrounding this incident. When the Portuguese Public Security Police arrested Tsafendas he was accused of pretending to be a religious missionary, while in reality preaching "under the guise of religion in favour of Mozambique's independence..."⁶⁷⁰⁹ While in custody, Tsafendas was asked by the police if he had ⁶⁷⁰⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁷⁰⁸ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁷⁰⁹ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

“dedicated himself to preach as a missionary and, under the guise of this same religion, advertised in favour of Mozambique’s independence.”⁶⁷¹⁰

Since he was apparently involved in a so-called missionary activity and because he carried Bibles and other religious literature as cover of his activities, Tsafendas came up with an idea that neatly fitted the situation. He pretended to be Christ’s apostle, Peter, and quoted the Christian scriptures at length. The trick worked and he was transferred to the Government Hospital in Beira for mental examination. Once again, he had managed to convince the Portuguese that he was mad but harmless, and he was soon released.⁶⁷¹¹

The author does not know for a fact whether the South African police received Tsafendas’s medical file from the Government Hospital in Beira, but it seems highly unlikely that they managed to get his file from every one of his hospitals around the world but this one. Furthermore, Lt.-Col van Wyk had already applied for this report, therefore it must have been in the police’s possession. A number of mostly bureaucratic reasons can be adduced as to why this particular hospitalization was omitted from the Commission’s report. What looms over all, however, is the likelihood that the Commission suppressed the information, not wanting to reveal that, tapeworm apart, Tsafendas, two years before the assassination, while also in custody, also believed he was Saint Peter. If this was revealed, the question would have been, why was such an important issue never brought up at his summary trial?

At the same time, if this information had become known, another major issue would have been raised, certainly by the psychiatrists and psychologists who would have read the Commission’s Report. This is how was it possible that for Tsafendas to believe he had a tapeworm for almost thirty years, then for this to be replaced by the conviction that he was Saint Peter, only for the Apostle to be ousted by his belief that boarders in the house where he was staying were being poisoned to death and finally for the tapeworm to return and take up residence. Professors Alban Burke and Tuviah Zabow and Mr. van Zyl told the author it was highly improbable, effectively impossible, for a person’s delusions to come and go like this or to have multiple delusions at the time.⁶⁷¹² This issue is discussed in detail in the Summary Trial Chapter.

⁶⁷¹⁰ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁷¹¹ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

Evidence Regarding Tsafendas's Hospitalizations

The Report lists a series of hospitals where Tsafendas was reported to have been admitted. Some of the names are taken from Tsafendas's statements to the South African police and some from what Tsafendas told the doctors in Grafton State Hospital. No evidence has been found in the archives or elsewhere substantiating that Tsafendas was indeed hospitalised as stated, except for his word. Naturally, Tsafendas had a very good reason to exaggerate his hospitalisations, but this does not mean that he was not hospitalised as he stated. What is surprising is that the Commission accepted his word, apparently without making any effort to double-check Tsafendas's statements.

CONCLUSION

The Commission included in its Report Tsafendas's medical examinations for various job applications, knowing such checks were standard practice by the companies concerned. Seven other examinations are omitted, including two conducted by two state doctors for Tsafendas's permanent residence application. On the other hand, the examination by another state doctor, Dr. Kossew, who found Tsafendas to be a schizophrenic, although he was not a psychiatrist and examined him for a little bit more than ten minutes, is included. Still, none of the ten doctors who examined Tsafendas during the previous two and a half years before the assassination saw any sign of Tsafendas's alleged problems as set out at his summary trial.

Of great importance is the revelation by the Commission that Tsafendas had faked mental illness while in the United States. This is something that no-one mentioned in the court, although it must have been known to the State as the relevant medical report was in the possession of the South African police a month before the trial started. However, another time Tsafendas faked mental illness, in Portugal in order not to serve in the Portuguese army, is omitted, though it is possible that this information was withheld by the police and not given to the Commission.

⁶⁷¹² Professor Alban Burke in a personal interview, 4 April 2016; Professor Tuviah Zabow in a personal interview, 11 April 2016; Reyner van Zyl in a personal interview, 10 April 2016.

Although the Commission goes into detail with Tsafendas's overseas hospitalizations, the most recent one in Mozambique in late 1964 is omitted. What makes this strange is that this hospitalization was known to the Commission, and the South African police were almost certainly in possession of the Beira hospital's records concerning Tsafendas. Then, why has it been omitted? The author can only speculate, but the fact that Tsafendas had pretended to be Saint Peter while he was in the custody of PIDE before being taken to the hospital suggests that this was the reason for the omission. It would have sounded strange, especially to psychiatrists and psychologists, if it had become known that Tsafendas, apart from allegedly believing he had a tapeworm since 1935, two years before the assassination he also believed he was Saint Peter.

TSAFENDAS AND THE FEMALE SEX

One gains the impression that he was unacceptable to the female sex. Neither the Whites nor the non-Whites would have anything to do with him. In Durban he tried to become more closely acquainted with a woman who belonged to his church, but she would have nothing to do with him.

During May, 1966, he met a non-White, Sybie Barendilla, at one of the church services. He wanted to visit her as well, but she was not agreeable.⁶⁷¹³

The Commission's "impression" of Tsafendas's relations with women is wrong and reads like an attempt to portray him as some kind of unsavoury outcast. The Report refers to only two contacts with females, an unnamed woman in Durban and Sybie Barendilla. The woman in Durban was Helen Struthers. She told the Commission that Tsafendas visited her at her house. She did not know him but she invited him in because, like her, he was a member of the Christian Church. Tsafendas stayed in the house for an hour. Struthers said, "He asked if he could see me again, apparently to promote a personal relationship, but I rejected his request and I also rejected to correspond with him." She never saw him again.⁶⁷¹⁴

As for Sybie Barendilla, this is an extract from her statement:⁶⁷¹⁵

"During about May, 1966, I again met him on a bus when I was returning to work after lunch. He remembered me, spoke to me and said he was on his way to Town to buy a pair of shoes. He enquired how my uncle was in America. I do not know how he came to know that I had an uncle in America and I did not ask him. The next day after this incident he walked past the shop where I was employed. He paused in the door, waved to me and walked on. The following day he came into the shop and bought a chocolate. I got the impression that he wanted to talk to me, but I cut him short and carried on with my work. On a public holiday, I think the 11th of July, 1966, he came to my house and enquired for me. My sister opened the door and spoke to him. He was insistent to see me, but my sister put him off. I heard the conversation and told my sister that I did not want to see him."⁶⁷¹⁶

It is clear from Barendilla's and Struthers's statements that Tsafendas made an ⁶⁷¹³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 41.

⁶⁷¹⁴ Helen Struthers statement to the COE, 19 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

⁶⁷¹⁵ Her full statement is available at Chapter Six.

⁶⁷¹⁶ Sybie Barendilla statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

approach to them and they were not interested. It should be recalled here that both women were members of the Christian Church and most of the Church's members who were questioned after the assassination sought to belittle and distance themselves from Tsafendas. It is very possible, though there is no evidence to prove it, that Barendilla and Struthers adopted such a stance. Even if Barendilla and Struthers were truly not interested in Tsafendas's advances, that does not make Tsafendas anathema to all women. There cannot be many men who have not been rejected at some time in their lives, which does not mean they are generally "unacceptable to the female sex."

Helen Daniels claimed that she was disappointed when meeting Tsafendas face to face and since he did not make any attempt to establish a relationship with her, it seems clear the disappointment was mutual. However, the fact that Tsafendas was recommended to Helen Daniels by fellow members of their Church is significant. She was a preacher and a highly respected member of the Church and it seems most unlikely that her co-religionists would suggest Tsafendas as a husband and urge her to meet him unless they held him in high esteem. The fact that she went to great lengths to communicate with Tsafendas suggests that what she had heard about him could only have been good.

Apart from the rejections above, there is no evidence that Tsafendas was the sort of person described by the Report as unacceptable to women. Indeed, the report from the Ochsensoll Krankenhaus Hospital in Hamburg in 1955 says that Tsafendas, upon his discharge, was picked up by a female friend who planned to accommodate him.⁶⁷¹⁷ Although it is not stated who this friend was, it is unlikely a woman would meet a man out of hospital and give him accommodation unless they were in a relationship. The Commission makes no reference to this woman when it refers to this hospitalization in Chapter II B, Paragraph 26. Light has been shed on the situation by Father Efthimios Eleftheriadis who met Tsafendas at the time in Hamburg. He said the woman was a young German Communist who did have a relationship with Tsafendas.⁶⁷¹⁸ While the Commission was almost certainly unaware of this information, it knew of the Hamburg hospital report but still made no reference to the woman mentioned.

⁶⁷¹⁷ Ochsensoll Hospital report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas. 6 June 1955. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1, Sub-file: 1/8. NASA.

⁶⁷¹⁸ Father Efthimios Eleftheriadis in a personal interview, 27 January 2011.

The Commission was also aware of the fact that Tsafendas had his first sexual encounter in 1936, since it is mentioned in the Grafton State Hospital report which was in the Commission's possession. However, there is no mention of it in the Report.⁶⁷¹⁹ According to Tsafendas's family, Tsafendas had a relationship with a Mozambican girl named Stella, who he saw for more than a year in the mid-1930s. It is very likely she was the one with whom he had his first grown-up sexual experience.⁶⁷²⁰ It is unlikely that the Commission knew anything of Stella, but it certainly knew that a certain female in 1936 found Tsafendas acceptable for a serious sexual encounter and omitted it from the Report.

Although the author is not in position to know Tsafendas's score card, he certainly had at least six serious girlfriends in his life. They were also from a range of ethnic backgrounds. The woman from Mozambique, Stella, was Black; then there was a White Jewish woman around 1940 in South Africa;⁶⁷²¹ a White Greek woman in Greece sometime in the late 1940s,⁶⁷²² a Portuguese woman, probably White, in Portugal in the 1950s,⁶⁷²³ a White Communist woman in Germany, also in the 1950s;⁶⁷²⁴ and a Turkish Muslim woman in Istanbul in 1961. The Turkish woman wanted to marry Tsafendas, but neither was willing to convert to the other's religion, and anyway, Tsafendas wanted to go back to Africa.⁶⁷²⁵

Indeed, according to many who knew him, Tsafendas was far from unacceptable to the female sex. The following views were gathered by the author, and obviously were not known to the Commission. Fotini Gavasiadis, who saw Tsafendas virtually every day for nine months in 1963-4 when they were flatmates, and then neighbours, while they also worked together, told the author: "Dimitris was adorable. He was a very sweet and kind man. He did not have a girlfriend at the time, but that was due to the fact that he was not interested in any particular woman as far as I could tell, not because he was unacceptable. He was tall and ⁶⁷¹⁹ Grafton State Hospital report regarding Demetrios Tsafandakis, n.d. Demitrio Tsafendas Mediese Leer A125. NASA.

⁶⁷²⁰ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁷²¹ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁷²² Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; van Woerden, 2000: 139.

⁶⁷²³ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶⁷²⁴ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Efthimios Eleftheriadis in a personal interview, 27 January 2011.

⁶⁷²⁵ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Alexandra Vaporidis in a personal interview, 4 November 2015; van Woerden, 2000: 139.

well-built; he was quite impressive.”⁶⁷²⁶

Alexandra Vaporidis knew Tsafendas for some seven months in Istanbul in 1961. She said Tsafendas was “not particularly handsome, but I would definitely not call him unacceptable to women. A lot of ladies in the church asked me about him. He then met a Turkish woman and they fell in love. I know some ladies were quite disappointed.”⁶⁷²⁷ Father Nikola Banovic, who knew Tsafendas for seven months in Istanbul in 1961, sharing accommodation with him for four of those months, strongly rejected the claim that Tsafendas was “unacceptable to women.” He told the author:

“There were some ladies, mostly I must say, older ladies, who were interested in him, but he was not interested. I told Dimitris and he said ‘they are too old for me.’ This Turkish lady I told you about fell in love with him, although she was a Muslim and he was a Christian and a Greek! His relationship with her caused quite a stir in the Greek community in Istanbul.”⁶⁷²⁸

Ira Kyriakakis, Helen Grispos and Andreas Babiolakis knew Tsafendas from childhood. Kyriakakis said that her sister Alice was in love with Tsafendas when she was at school, but Tsafendas was then in a relationship with Stella. She described him when he was younger as a “tall, handsome man.” She said, “He put on some weight when he was older, but he was still handsome.”⁶⁷²⁹ Babiolakis said Tsafendas was very popular with girls while a teenager in Mozambique.⁶⁷³⁰

Helen Grispos told the author:

“[Tsafendas] was of a certain type, unique, that made him attractive to women. I used to like him when we were in Mozambique. He was not like the other teenagers of the time. He was very-well-read and seemed sophisticated and different, at least to me! He was not like Alain Delon, but he was not ugly either. He would not stand out in the crowd for his beauty, but he was certainly attractive to women, at least to some women, especially after you get to know him.”⁶⁷³¹

Katerina Pnema, his half-sister, told the author how Tsafendas had courted a Jewish ⁶⁷²⁶ Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015.

⁶⁷²⁷ Alexandra Vaporidis in a personal interview, 23 August 2015.

⁶⁷²⁸ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

⁶⁷²⁹ ; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015.

⁶⁷³⁰ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016.

⁶⁷³¹ Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013.

girl who was their sister's best friend at the time:

“He wrote her several notes and my sister would deliver them. He was shy and wouldn't let us know what he was writing, but the girl would later tell my sister! I can't remember what he was saying, but I think it was just how beautiful she is and things like this! He sent her many notes with my sister as the courier. Eventually, we all went out one day and she fell in love with him and started going out with him.”⁶⁷³²

Pnefma dismissed the Commission's comment as quite wrong. However, she added that Tsafendas's appearance changed markedly after he acquired his metal teeth:

“He did these teeth, and when he came up to my poor brother-in-law's, and when we saw him, I tell you, he looked like a monster. All his mouth was stainless steel or whatever it is. One day I was listening to the wireless, and you know how funny things happen. A woman was talking and she said, after Tsafendas committed the crime, ‘Do you know, he came to the shop...’ he came to her takeaway. And she said, ‘When he came in and he smiled at me, I got such a fright.’ And he went apparently a couple of times, but I think she was afraid of him. The way she talked, she didn't want him near her shop... All our children got such a fright when they first saw his teeth, but then they got used of him and they liked him very much.”⁶⁷³³

Irene Michaletos, who knew him very well for more than a year (1964-1965), when he often visited her house in Beira, also mentioned the issue with the teeth. She told the author:

“To tell you the truth, when I first saw him, I was a little scared of him. He had a frightening face. He was not ugly at all, he just had these metal teeth that were really scary. He was tall and big; he looked like this villain from the James Bond movie [Jaws in The Spy who Loved Me and Moonraker]. When I saw the movie many years later, he immediately reminded me of Dimitris. But when you got to know him you could see that he was a gentle giant, a very kind-hearted man.”⁶⁷³⁴

Tsafendas's first cousin, Mary Eendracht, who grew up with him in Mozambique and Egypt, told the author that “Dimitris had some conquests, but also some rejections, like happens to most men. Women were not falling to their feet for him, but there were quite a ⁶⁷³² Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁷³³ Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁷³⁴ Irene Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

few who were interested in him; I don't think he have any particular difficulty finding a girlfriend."⁶⁷³⁵

It is blindingly clear from the above statements that far from being unacceptable to women, Tsafendas had a number of acknowledged, serious relationships, and it is more than likely for a man who travelled far and wide, that there were others. While the Commission was unaware of most of the above information, it only had the evidence of three rejections on which to base its statement that Tsafendas was unacceptable to the female sex. The statement was a matter of opinion and wildly inaccurate. In addition, in the evidence held by the Commission, Daniels testified that Tsafendas was recommended highly to her by her friends, there was a reference in Grafton State Hospital report to Tsafendas having sex with a girl when he was a teenager, while the Ochsenzoll Krankenhaus Hospital report mentions a woman who picked him up from the hospital when he was released to take him to her house.

⁶⁷³⁵ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014.

PART II: SPECIFIC INCIDENTS AND OTHER ISSUES

THE ELENI

One of the most important elements in the Commission's Report concerns the Eleni, a Greek tanker which arrived in Cape Town for repairs on the 24th of July 1966 and remained docked there until the 3rd of September 1966, leaving just three days before Dr. Verwoerd's assassination.⁶⁷³⁶ The Commission discusses the Eleni in Chapter II C, Paragraphs 77-87, in greater detail than anything else in its Report. Those eleven paragraphs pay particular attention to claims that Dr. Verwoerd's death had been rumoured at the ship days before it occurred, but they omit signals as to how this might have come about, as well as significant details relating to Tsafendas, his background and his activities.

In the course of his work as a commission agent for a men's clothes outfitter, Tsafendas visited the tanker on a daily basis, often taking his meals there, and quickly became friendly with the crew, most of whom were Greeks. He was comfortable talking to the men because, like him, they were not South Africans; more importantly, some were Communists, with whom he felt very much at home.

Tsafendas testified to the police in his two statements of the 11th and the 19th of September, that he visited the Eleni every day that she was docked in Cape Town. The crew's testimonies were therefore important in determining Tsafendas's movements in the days before the assassination. Furthermore, Tsafendas testified that he had bought a gun from two members of the crew and was planning to escape on board the Eleni. Of particular interest to the Commission were the Dr. Verwoerd death rumours. Reginald Robert Maile, a South African security guard on the Eleni, told the police that three days before the assassination he was asked by Maria Kokkinidou, a woman who often visited the Eleni, where her son worked on a temporary basis, "Is Dr. Verwoerd dead?" Edmund George Stollenkamp, the ship's night watchman, was also involved in these exchanges about Dr. Verwoerd being dead. Because of these rumours, the Eleni played a prominent role in the police investigation.

According to the Commission's Report, the crew of the Eleni were questioned by the South African police on 12th October 1966 in Venice, Italy, where the vessel was then docked. The Eleni had a crew of thirty-eight men, thirty-four of them Greek, and almost every one of them was questioned, but as already stated, only four of their statements were found in NASA. The four were the captain of the Eleni, Michael Fountotos, Nicholas Mavronas, Emanuil Mastromanolis and Constandinos Kokkinidis, the temporary hire. Of the four, only Mastromanolis had associated frequently with Tsafendas. A further note was found in the archives referring to Dimitris Zafiriadis, a crew member who had become close to Tsafendas. However, the document was not an official statement, since Zafiriadis had refused to give one, merely a note containing some remarks by him. What happened in this particular round of questioning in Venice, and what the crew told the author are examined in detail in the Investigation Chapter, and will not be discussed again here.

⁶⁷³⁶ Michael N. Fountotos statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol 3, File Die 'Eleni.' NASA.

IS DR. VERWOERD DEAD?

Eight paragraphs in the Report, 80-87, deal with Dr. Verwoerd's death being discussed at the tanker three days before the actual assassination. The Commission asked Major Rossouw:

COMMISSION: Another thing is that there is a lot of evidence that on the Friday morning BEFORE the murder people had been running back and forth screaming to one another that Dr. Verwoerd had been murdered – are you aware of this?

MAJOR ROSSOUW: Yes I am aware of that ...⁶⁷³⁷

Although the Commission referred to “a lot of evidence,” its Report contains very little of this evidence and fails to explain what happened. This is the description according to the Commission's Report:

80. Another visitor to the Eleni was a Mrs. Kokkinidou, a widow. Both she and the Captain originally came from Kilimnos, Greece. She was accompanied by Mr. Nicolai Christodoulos, a bachelor who lodges with her. Her son Constantinos Kokkinidou had started work on the Eleni in August, 1966.

On the morning of 3rd September, 1966, the ship had to be moved, and for this reason the gangplank was drawn up. The night watch, Stollenkamp, stood on deck because he was unable to get off the ship, and the morning watch, Maile, stood on the quay. The latter had a copy of the Cape Times with him. Near Mr. Stollenkamp stood Constantinos Kokkinidou. On the quay Mrs. Kokkinidou and Mr. Cristodoulos stood a short distance from Mr. Maile. As there are some discrepancies in the versions of what exactly happened then, the account of each of these five persons is given. Four gave oral evidence and a statement was received from Constantinos ⁶⁷³⁷ Major Daniel Jacobus Rossouw testimony to the COE, 14 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

Kokkinidou.

81. Mr. Maile said that Mrs. Kokkinidou asked him: "Is Dr. Verwoerd dead?" He says that he then called spontaneously to Stollenkamp and asked whether Dr. Verwoerd was dead.

82. Mrs. Kokkinidou says that her son shouted to her from the deck and asked whether she had heard the news that Dr. Verwoerd was dead. When she asked him who had said so, he pointed to Stollenkamp and said that the man with the newspaper—Maile—had said so. She says that she then asked the man with the newspaper whether Dr. Verwoerd was dead, and he explained that Stollenkamp had misunderstood him.

83. Mr. Christodoulos confirmed Mrs. Kokkinidou's evidence.

84. Constantinos Kokkinidou stated that the night watch said to them "Do you know what? Dr. Verwoerd has been killed." When he asked him who had said so, he (the night watch) pointed to the morning watch. He then told his mother, Mrs. Kokkinidou, that Dr. Verwoerd had been killed. His mother was upset, and he asked the night watch how Dr. Verwoerd had been killed. The night watch in turn asked the morning watch, and when the latter had replied, the night watch told Constantinos that he (the night watch) had misunderstood the morning watch. He then conveyed this to his mother. Mrs. Kokkinidou understands a little English and apparently no Afrikaans. The two watchmen had spoken Afrikaans to each other, while the Kokkinidous had spoken in Greek!

85. Stollenkamp says that Maile told him that Dr. Verwoerd was dead. He gave him to understand that it was in the newspaper. He then asked the young man standing next to him (it must have been Constantinos) whether he had heard that Dr. Verwoerd was dead. The young man then spoke to his mother, and then Maile told her that Dr. Verwoerd was not dead.

86. It is impossible to establish with any certainty exactly what was said. However, there is no doubt that Dr. Verwoerd's death was mentioned on that morning three days before his death. What makes these incidents more than a coincidence is the fact that this was said at the ship which was visited daily for almost 40 days by the man who killed Dr. Verwoerd, where he bought a pistol and tried to buy a knife which he wanted to use—according to at least one statement made by him subsequently—to kill Dr. Verwoerd.

The fact that Dr. Verwoerd's death was mentioned at that ship was probably more than pure coincidence.

87. The Commission must emphasize, however, that none of the five persons who took part in the conversation that took place that morning is suspected of any complicity. As has already been stated, the Commission had the opportunity of questioning four of them in person. The police report on Mrs. Kokkinidou and Mr. Christodoulou is favourable. What could have happened is that the discontented crew of the Eleni might, on the numerous occasions when they condemned the State's colour policy, have wished for Dr. Verwoerd's end. Something of this kind could have had a profound effect on the feelings of resentment Tsafendas already had. It might also have been that Tsafendas had on some occasion or other intimated that it was his intention to murder Dr. Verwoerd, and that for obvious reasons those who heard this do not now wish to make any admission in this regard.

The Commission fails to shed any light on these apparently confused exchanges and the conclusions in its Report are entirely speculative. It does not clarify how the rumour started, it simply guesses that the disgruntled Eleni crew wished Dr. Verwoerd dead and that Tsafendas was somehow sparked into action as a result. Crucially, while the witnesses' version of events is represented perfectly accurately, what is missing is what was said by the seamen, who are not named in the Report.

The Commission states that the mention of Dr. Verwoerd's death was "probably more than pure coincidence," but its whole treatment of the case is superficial to say the least. If it was more than a coincidence, this suggests that there were people prior to the assassination who were expecting it. However it appears that the Commission failed to investigate this important matter any further. The most astonishing thing is that the South African police were well aware of what happened and what was said on the Eleni, but none of this is mentioned in the Report.

A further puzzling point about the Commission's handling of the issue is that Tsafendas's opinion about how Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed is not mentioned. Although it seems that he is asked to explain about the gun, no reference is made to what he said, if he said anything, to the Commission about such an important issue. It seems that the Commission, which interviewed him twice, either did not ask him to explain or simply suppressed his answer. It seems inconceivable that the Commission would not ask Tsafendas such an important question, especially since he was the person most likely to have an explanation of what happened. If Tsafendas was asked, his most likely reaction would have been to tell the truth, as he had done with the police regarding his motive for and planning of the assassination. This was that he had characterised a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd as morally justifiable because he was a dictator who was oppressing his people. Thus, the Commission would have had a good reason to hide his answers. However, we are not in position to know for certain whether the Commission asked Tsafendas such a question, It simply seems surprising that his side of the story is not heard, although he gave evidence twice to Judge van Wyk.

One of the four statements by the Eleni crew which were found in the National Archives of South Africa was that of Constandinos Kokkinidis⁶⁷³⁸ (his correct name, not Kokkindou as in the Report). The Report gives the impression that no-one else from the crew was asked about the incident. However, nine of the twelve seamen who were interviewed by the author and were questioned by the police in Venice, clearly remember being asked whether Tsafendas had mentioned anything about killing Dr. Verwoerd. Five of them, Alachiotis, Billis, Kambouris, Kantas and Vasilakis, stated to the author that they had told the police that Tsafendas had spoken of a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. He had characterised such an act as morally justifiable because Dr. Verwoerd was a dictator and a tyrant.⁶⁷³⁹

However, Tsafendas never said that he intended to kill the Prime Minister himself. A sixth seaman, Grigoris Pouftis, was present at this conversation, but he is unsure whether he told the police about it.⁶⁷⁴⁰ Mastromanolis, whose statement was one of the four found in the archives, was asked about it, but there is no mention of his answer in the statement. However, he had no knowledge of the conversation at the dockside and had told the police so, which is probably why there is no mention of it in his statement.⁶⁷⁴¹

The six seamen mentioned above freely explained to the police the circumstances of the conversation about a hypothetical assassination, at which they were all present. They said Tsafendas had spent the evening before the Eleni weighed anchor on board the vessel as he often did with some of his friends in the crew, among them Billis, Kantas, Alachiotis, Kambouris, Vasilakis, Pouftis, Xexenis and Zafiriadis. Xexenis asked Tsafendas if, during his ⁶⁷³⁸ His statement is available in Chapter Five.

⁶⁷³⁹ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

⁶⁷⁴⁰ Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009.

⁶⁷⁴¹ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016.

wanderings in Africa, he had met Ioannis (Jean) Karageorgis, a Greek man who, on October 13, 1961, assassinated Prince Rwagasore, the first elected President of independent Burundi. Xexenis was from the same village as Karageorgis, but he had never met him. The other crew members were unaware of this event, so Tsafendas and the seaman told them what had happened. Tsafendas fiercely condemned the assassination, stating that Karageorgis was hired by the Belgian colonialists and was rightly executed because Rwagasore had been popularly elected.⁶⁷⁴²

A discussion about assassination ensued and the conversation extended to assassinations such as John F. Kennedy's in 1963 and that of King George I of Greece in 1913. Tsafendas argued that if Karageorgis had assassinated Dr. Verwoerd, it would have been justifiable, a tyrannicide, because South Africa's Prime Minister was a tyrant and a dictator who was oppressing his people. This, he said, did not apply to Prince Rwagasore, who was democratically elected.⁶⁷⁴³

Some thirty years after the assassination, Tsafendas repeated to Fathers Ioannis Tsaftaridis, Minas Constandinou and Spiros Randos his belief that assassinating Dr. Verwoerd was justified because he was a tyrant and a dictator.⁶⁷⁴⁴ This was exactly what he told the seamen three days before the assassination. Tsafendas had also characterised Dr. Verwoerd as a tyrant, dictator and "Hitler's best student" to some of the sailors and to several other witnesses prior to the assassination. All of this confirms the sailors' testimony that they heard Tsafendas using such words.

Billis, Kantas, Alachiotis, Kambouris and Vasilakis are positive that they told the police about this conversation. Pouftis, although present at the conversation, cannot remember whether he told the police about it, but he assumes that he did.⁶⁷⁴⁵ Mastromanolis, Tsabouniaris, Speis and Perselis all remember being asked whether Tsafendas said anything ⁶⁷⁴² Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁴³ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁴⁴ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Ioannis Tsaftaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶⁷⁴⁵ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

about killing Dr. Verwoerd and replied ‘no’ since they were not aware of the conversation.⁶⁷⁴⁶ The question posed by the police was a perfectly natural one since they knew Dr. Verwoerd’s death was discussed on board the tanker. However, there is no mention in the Report of Tsafendas’s discussion of various assassinations nor that he had characterised a possible assassination of Tsafendas as tyrannicide and morally justifiable.

The author cannot know for certain how the dockside exchanges as described in the Report started. The crewmen suggested to the author that Kokkinidis may have been at the table when the assassination discussion took place, or more likely nearby, since he did not fraternise with Tsafendas nor with the men there at the time. It is possible that Kokkinidis overheard snippets of the discussion and misunderstood them, passing them on a few hours later at the dockside. The men who spoke to the author all believe this is the likeliest explanation.

All of the thirteen sailors interviewed by the author and met Tsafendas in Cape Town stated emphatically that he never indicated that he intended to kill Dr. Verwoerd and that none of the men ever “wished for Dr. Verwoerd’s end,” as the Report proposed. These facts render the Commission’s conclusion entirely wrong. Those who participated in the discussion about “justifiable assassinations” maintain that this was the only time that a conversation close to that described in the Report took place, indeed the only time that Dr. Verwoerd’s “death” was discussed. What adds strength to the argument that the assassination discussion started the rumours is that it took place a few hours before the dockside exchanges involving Kokkinidis and his mother, her lodger and the security guards. Although there cannot be 100 per cent certainty that the “death” rumours started in the way suggested above, it is a much more plausible hypothesis than that suggested by the Commission, involving crewmen’s discontent somehow pervading Tsafendas’s psyche.

Nevertheless, the main issue here is not how the rumours began but the fact that at least five witnesses testified to the police that Tsafendas had characterised a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd as justifiable and as tyrannicide, just three days before the actual assassination, and of this the Report makes no mention at all. The Commission was right that it was more than a coincidence that Dr. Verwoerd’s death was discussed before he died. There could be no other explanation. However, the Commission failed to report accurately on the incident and how it occurred and instead attempted superficially to reconstruct the events and present a feasible scenario while admitting that it was “impossible to establish with any certainty exactly what was said.” This should not have been the case as the police had all the evidence about what happened and what was said on the Eleni.

⁶⁷⁴⁶ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Ioannis Speis in a personal interview, 12 July 2015; Emanuil Tsabouniaris in personal interview with the author, 14 June 2016.

The author is not in position to know whether Judge van Wyk suppressed the seamen’s evidence about the “justifiable assassination” discussion or whether the police withheld that information from the Commission. The fact is that this crucial development is missing from the Report. It would have contradicted what was heard at the summary trial and presented an entirely different picture of Tsafendas and his motive.

THE PURCHASE OF THE GUN

One Nicholas Mavros, a galley boy on the Eleni, alleges in a statement made on 12th October, 1966, in Venice on or about 26th or 27th August, 1966, that Tsafendas told some of the crew on board the Eleni that he wished to buy a pistol or knife, that he could obtain a position at a hotel at £2,000 and that he needed such a weapon for his protection. They regarded him as “foolish” and decided to play a trick on him by selling him a small pistol which they looked upon as a toy.

Subsequently they did sell it to him for 30 dollars. Of this, Mavros received 20 dollars and one Emanuel Mastromanolus, the boatswain, ten. The latter confirmed this statement. This transaction must have taken place on or after 1st September, 1966, since, according to a statement made by a bank, Tsafendas bought 80 dollars on that date. On 3rd September, the day on which the Eleni sailed, Tsafendas came to claim his money back because the pistol was not in working order. (It was in fact a gas pistol.) They refused, however, to pay anything back. Tsafendas complained that he was a poor man and that he had had to work a whole week for the 30 dollars.

Michael N. Fontatis, the Captain of the Eleni, says in a statement that Tsafendas came to him on 3rd September, 1966, to complain about this, but that he refused to have anything to do with the matter. He considered Tsafendas (childish, mentioning as an example Tsafendas’s offer to find an engineer to repair the ship—a job which cost £30,000.⁶⁷⁴⁷

The first point to make is that the name of the person who sold the gun to Tsafendas was Mavronas, not Mavros; the Commission misspelled it. It was Mavronas who stated to the police that “we regarded him as foolish and decided to joke with him.” That was his statement alone, not an opinion shared by other crew members. According to thirteen sailors who were interviewed by the author and who knew Tsafendas well, no-one considered him to be foolish; on the contrary, all spoke highly of him. Their statements can be found in the Eleni section in the Investigation Chapter.

⁶⁷⁴⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 78.

Vasilis Perselis, the steward on the Eleni and a good friend of Mavronas, stated to the author that Tsafendas told them he was working at a hotel and needed a firearm for protection and to “scare people off” because he was living in a rough area. Michalis Vasilakis, a stoker, confirmed Perselis’s statement. Nikolas Kambouris and Emanuil Mastromanolis stated to the study that they do not remember Tsafendas saying anything about a hotel, but they remember him saying he needed a gun to “scare people off” because he was living in a rough area; he never said he was looking for a real one.⁶⁷⁴⁸

In interviews with the author, seven seamen, Nikolaos Billis, Georgios Kantas, Ilias Kokkinos, Vasilakis, Kambouris, Mastromanolis and Perselis, declared that Mavronas’s claim that they “decided to joke” with Tsafendas was untrue. In fact, initially they all thought that Mavronas’s weapon was real, since this is what he told them. They said Mavronas, who was only seventeen years old at the time, was showing off his gun unaware himself that it was just a gas pistol. Many of the crew were also fooled, as the pistol looked real.⁶⁷⁴⁹ Kambouris was the first to discover that the gun was not authentic. He believed Mavronas was fooled by the person who sold the gun to him.⁶⁷⁵⁰ Mastromanolis claimed that he only realised the weapon was fake when he suggested that Mavronas should sell it to Tsafendas for a quick profit. Mavronas then admitted that the gun was not real, after he had been told by Kambouris, but he still offered to sell it to Tsafendas on grounds that it would be “good enough to scare people off.”⁶⁷⁵¹

The rest of the Report’s account is accurate: Tsafendas went back to the ship and asked Mavronas and Mastromanolis for his money back, but they said that they had charged ⁶⁷⁴⁸ Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

⁶⁷⁴⁹ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

⁶⁷⁵⁰ Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014.

⁶⁷⁵¹ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016.

him only thirty dollars instead of the original eighty because the pistol was just a gas gun.

CREW'S "DISSATISFACTION" WITH THE COLOUR POLICY

*Reginald Robert Maile was a morning watch on the Eleni while it was in Cape Town harbour. He says the crew were most dissatisfied about the colour policy of the Government. They wanted to bring Coloured women on board, but were not allowed to do so.*⁶⁷⁵²

Thirteen men who were with the Eleni in Cape Town all deny that any of the crew were dissatisfied because they were not allowed to bring Coloured women on board. They dismiss Maile's claim out of hand, describing it as ridiculous and stating that whoever wished to have sex with non-White women simply went ashore and did so; no-one was the least bothered about the Act, it was simply ignored. After all, the men had easy access to White women in Cape Town and being seamen and travellers, they did not view sex with non-White women as a unique or an especially sought-after experience.⁶⁷⁵³

None of the sailors remembers discussing the issue with Maile, but they accept that they might have said something about the Act because Maile was constantly warning them that sex with Coloured women was illegal. Tsafendas had given them the same caution but two of the men, Vasilakis and Kambouris, said that Maile reminded them whenever they went ashore to "stay away from non-White women," indeed from non-White people. The men did not trust Maile because he was South African and it is possible that they complained about the Act to cover up the fact that they were having sex with non-White women anyway.⁶⁷⁵⁴

The crew were not "dissatisfied" about apartheid, they were angry, and this was not due to the proscription against Coloured women, but to their discovery of how non-Whites were treated. According to the seamen, Tsafendas had asked them spend as little money as possible in South Africa in order not to contribute to the apartheid economy and to show them what apartheid was really like, he took a group to a township in Cape Town. The sailors ⁶⁷⁵² Chapter II C, Paragraph 79.

⁶⁷⁵³ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Panteleimon Aspiotis in a personal interview, 6 June 2015; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; D. Lallis in a personal interview, 19 June 2015; E. Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; V. Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; I. Speis in a personal interview, 12 July 2015; D. Stavrianos in a personal interview, 18 January 2015; E. Tsabouniaris in a personal interview with the author, 14 June 2016; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

⁶⁷⁵⁴ Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

were shocked at the conditions they witnessed. It was then that some of the crew made the comment mentioned by Tsafendas in his statement to the police, that the South Africans “should be taught a lesson,” and which prompted Mastromanolis to state repeatedly that they “need a good whipping.”⁶⁷⁵⁵

OMISSIONS REGARDING THE ELENI FROM THE REPORT

Tsafendas’s talk about justifiable assassination is not the only incident involving the seamen that is omitted.

Tsafendas’s being a Communist and his participation in the Greek Civil War

That Tsafendas was a Communist was stated to the South African police by at least six men - Alachiotis, Billis, Kambouris, Kantas, Pouftis and Vasilakis. Some of the crew often joined him in singing Greek Communist songs on board, but they did not mention this to the police, as they did not want to reveal themselves as Communists too.⁶⁷⁵⁶ The most important thing the six men told the police was that Tsafendas had participated in the Greek Civil War on the side of the Democratic Army of Greece, the military wing of the Greek Communist Party.⁶⁷⁵⁷ As we have seen in the Investigation Chapter, Mavronas also testified to this, but he was probably misunderstood by the policeman who questioned him. However, there is no mention in the Report of Tsafendas joining in the war. Tsafendas’s role in the Greek Civil War is examined in detail in the “political activities and ideology” section of this Chapter and in his Biography.

⁶⁷⁵⁵ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁷⁵⁶ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁵⁷ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

The Visit to a Township in Cape Town

This important event goes unmentioned in the Commission's Report. The visit was disclosed to the police in Venice by at least five men –Alachiotis, Billis, Kambouris, Kantas and Vasilakis.⁶⁷⁵⁸ Two more, Mastromanolis and Pouftis, do not remember if they told the police about it, but believe they probably did.⁶⁷⁵⁹ Ilias Aspras was not interviewed by the author, but he was among those who visited the township and the men believe that he must have also testified to that effect. Dimitris Zafiriadis was in Tsafendas's party, but he refused to give the police any statement.⁶⁷⁶⁰

The seamen spoke about their onshore visit because they believed the police would have found out about it anyway. What they concealed was Tsafendas's purpose – to show them the living conditions of Black South Africans, and the fact that he urged them to not spend their money in South Africa because of apartheid. They told the police they behaved simply as tourists. There is no hint in the seamen's statements that Tsafendas organised the visit for political reasons, but even as it was, the visit did not see the light of day in the Commission's Report.

Spitting Gesture

On one occasion, Michalis Vasilakis brought a local newspaper on board which had Dr. Verwoerd's photograph on one page. When Vasilakis pointed to the picture, Tsafendas directed a spitting gesture at the floor, a classical Greek demonstration of contempt. Vasilakis, Alachiotis, Billis, Kambouris and Pouftis all said they told the police about this incident. Kantas and Perselis remember the incident but are not sure if they told the police.⁶⁷⁶¹ However, no mention of this small, but significant demonstration of Tsafendas's opinions is made in the Report. Some thirty years later, when Tsafendas was in hospital, ⁶⁷⁵⁸ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁵⁹ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009.

⁶⁷⁶⁰ Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁶¹ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; V. Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

Father Minas Constandinou showed him a newspaper photograph of Dr. Verwoerd, and Tsafendas repeated the spitting gesture.⁶⁷⁶²

Tsafendas and the Portuguese Army

As we have seen, a politically significant event in Tsafendas's life, which was given to the police by the crew, was Tsafendas saying he had "played the fool" in order to avoid service in the Portuguese Army. At least six men testified to this: Alachiotis, Billis, Kambouris, Kantas, Pouftis and Vasilakis, while it is very likely Perselis and Aspras did so, too.⁶⁷⁶³ This was very important information since the Commission was aware that Tsafendas had also faked mental illness while in the USA. Knowing he had done it for a second time would have certainly raised eyebrows about whether Tsafendas was faking mental illness again, for a third time. However, the account of his act was suppressed.

Tsafendas's Plan of Escape

Tsafendas told the police that his initial plan was to hide in the Eleni after shooting Dr. Verwoerd, then sail away in the tanker the next day. That is why initially he planned to carry out the assassination on the evening of September 2, only a few hours before the Eleni's scheduled departure.⁶⁷⁶⁴ This was highly significant information because it demonstrated that the assassination was carefully planned and not an impulsive act. Not only did the Commission ignore the escape plan, it omitted the reasons that Tsafendas went then ahead with the assassination, knowing that he had no chance of escape. This issue is discussed in the "assassination" section of this chapter.

TSAFENDAS AS DESCRIBED BY THE CREW AND OTHERS ASSOCIATED WITH THE ELENI

Although Tsafendas visited the Eleni every day for forty-two days up to three days before the assassination, none of the seamen's opinions or those of others connected to the Eleni are ⁶⁷⁶² Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶⁷⁶³ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; V. Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁶⁴ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

mentioned in the Report. The Commission included comments about Tsafendas's character by people who scarcely knew him, such as James Johnston who had spent a total of twenty minutes talking to him, but omitted the words of many who knew him far longer. Of particular value must have been the views of crewmen who chatted with Tsafendas shortly before the assassination, yet they are not included. The following are comments made to the police by non-crew members who knew Tsafendas at the Eleni:

- Neville Judson worked with Tsafendas for Mike's Outfitters for forty-two days in July and August 1966, frequently driving him to the Eleni. He told the police that he "never in no way got the impression that he (Tsafendas) could be mentally deranged. He appeared to be a normal man with normal reasoning powers" and "a very friendly way of talking."⁶⁷⁶⁵ His comments were omitted from the Report.
- Reginald Robert Maile, a security guard on the Eleni, who testified about the "Is Dr. Verwoerd dead?" issue, also told the police that he saw Tsafendas every day for forty-two days and he "never got the impression that he could be mentally defective. He was sober, polite and perfectly normal" and "on very friendly relations with the crew."⁶⁷⁶⁶ His comments were omitted from the Report.
- Peter Protoulis was a supplier of foodstuffs to the Eleni. He claims that he testified to the police and to the Commission, but only his statement to the police was found. However, his name was found in the schedule list for interviews of the Commission and he was listed to give evidence on October 12. Protoulis told the author that he never heard Tsafendas say anything to suggest he was less than sane. He is certain that he was sane. Furthermore, he was "very impressed by the way he was dressed. He always wore a suit and very often a tie and a hat. I never show him wearing the same clothes two days in a row."⁶⁷⁶⁷

Below are extracts from the statements of the eleven seamen who told the author that they were questioned in Venice and whose statements were not found in the archives. This is how they remember Tsafendas and is approximately what they believe they told the police. Their full interviews with the author are available in the Investigation Chapter.

⁶⁷⁶⁵ Neville Judson statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die 'Eleni.' NASA.

⁶⁷⁶⁶ Reginald Robert Maile statement to the police, 27 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: Die 'Eleni.' NASA.

⁶⁷⁶⁷ Peter Protoulis in a personal interview, 3 August 2016.

Cleanthes Alachiotis remembers telling the police the “truth and everything that had happened,” apart from singing Communist songs and the fact that Tsafendas had asked them to spend as little money as possible in South Africa. He did mention the visit to the township. When asked if Tsafendas had said anything about the Prime Minister, Alachiotis replied that Tsafendas “did not like him much and called him ‘Hitler’s best student.’” Alachiotis was ready to mention the “Hitler” remark because he believed, as they all did, that the police must have known about it since Tsafendas used the expression so often and so widely.

Alachiotis clearly remembers being asked if Tsafendas had said anything about killing Dr. Verwoerd. He assumed that the policeman was referring to the conversation on the Eleni’s last night in Cape Town when Tsafendas argued that it would be justifiable to kill Dr. Verwoerd because he was a tyrant, while the murder of Prince Rwagasore was to be condemned because he was a democratically elected President. Therefore, Alachiotis told the whole story to the policeman, who showed great interest in it. Asked for his opinion about Tsafendas, Alachiotis could not remember exactly what he told the police, but believes that he must have told them he was a “harmless man, good-hearted, a quiet man ... very polite and well-mannered ... he seemed 100 per cent normal” as this is the way he remembered him. He also told the police that Tsafendas had told the crew that “he had played the fool with the Portuguese army in order not to serve his military duty... that he had joined the Communist army in the Civil War.”⁶⁷⁶⁸

Panteleimon Aspiotis does not remember the details of what he told the police, but presumes he told them most of what he remembered about Tsafendas. What he did not mention was fishing for lobster because Tsafendas had told them “not to tell anyone because it was illegal.” He remembers the issue about the gun, but he had nothing to do with it. Aspiotis maintains that Tsafendas “was perfectly fine” and this is what he told the police when asked about his character, that, “He was like any other person. He was definitely not insane. Him? Insane? No, definitely not! I wasn’t expecting such a question because the man was not mad.”⁶⁷⁶⁹

Nikolaos Billis remembers “everything ... I told them everything I knew. I was terrified. This was a serious case. You couldn’t mess around with it.” He mentioned Tsafendas’s mad act to avoid service in the Portuguese army and explained to the policeman that it was “common in Greece.” He also told the police that Tsafendas was a Communist and against apartheid, though he does not remember the details of what he said. He said Tsafendas frequently talked about politics, but he did not understand him since he had no knowledge or interest in the subject.

⁶⁷⁶⁸ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010.

⁶⁷⁶⁹ Panteleimon Aspiotis in a personal interview, 6 June 2015.

Billis also mentioned the trip to the township and claimed they had gone there for touristic reasons, to see where the Black people lived. He also remembers being asked if they discussed politics with Tsafendas and what his impression of him was. He does not remember being asked whether Tsafendas had served in any army, but he definitely told them about his mad act with the Portuguese. He also told the police that Tsafendas had told them that he had fought in the Greek Civil War with the Communists. Billis also told the police about their discussion regarding justifiable assassinations after he was asked whether Tsafendas had mentioned anything about killing Dr. Verwoerd.⁶⁷⁷⁰

Nikolas Kambouris remembers that “the only thing I did not say was that we sang Communist songs ... I told them that he spat towards the Prime Minister’s picture ... yes, I certainly mentioned the ‘Hitler’s best student’ comment - this is something almost every one of the crew had heard.” Kambouris was asked to explain what Tsafendas meant with the remark about Hitler and Dr. Verwoerd but did not know what to say. He eventually said perhaps Tsafendas meant that Dr. Verwoerd had studied in Germany and Hitler was his tutor, avoiding any further supposition.

When the policeman asked if Tsafendas had said anything about killing the Prime Minister, Kambouris assumed, like the rest of the crew, that he was referring to Tsafendas’s claim that killing Dr. Verwoerd would be tyrannicide. Kambouris had to explain in detail to the policeman what tyrannicide was and Tsafendas’s theories about it. “I had to explain the whole thing and how it was in ancient Greece ... the policeman was very interested in this. I told him though that Tsafendas did not say he was going to kill the Prime Minister; just that it would have been justifiable if someone does.”

Kambouris also said about Tsafendas, “he did not look mad to me and certainly did not act like a madman. He never said or did anything to make me think he was a madman, he seemed perfectly fine.” He believes that he must also have told the police that Tsafendas had expressed his wish to go and live in Cuba. He described how Tsafendas told them he had ⁶⁷⁷⁰ Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011.

fought in the Greek Civil War with the Communists. What he did not mention was Tsafendas urging them to avoid spending money in South Africa, that Tsafendas had given him a book, ‘Ten Days That Shook the World,’⁶⁷⁷¹ which was banned in South Africa, that they fished for lobster and sang Communist songs.⁶⁷⁷²

George Kantas remembers “Tsafendas calling White South Africans Nazis. I told him everything I knew. We all told them everything, everything. We couldn’t take a chance and hide something. We did not tell them we were singing Communist songs together because it was only five or six of us and no-one else knew about it... I did not tell him that Tsafendas asked us to boycott South Africa and not spend any money there. Was I crazy to say it?”

Kantas does not remember what exactly he said about Tsafendas’s personality, but he remembers him as a “very well-read and well-mannered man who knew a lot about politics and history,” and he presumes this is what he told the police. When the policeman asked Kantas if he thought Tsafendas was “normal,” he replied, “Yes, perfectly normal.” He remembers going to the township and assumes he told the police but he cannot be certain. He remembers Tsafendas saying he wanted to live in “socialist Cuba,” but he doesn’t remember if he mentioned this to the police. He is certain that he mentioned Tsafendas’s mad act to dodge the Portuguese Army, and that he had joined the DSE during the Greek Civil War.

Like everyone else, Kantas was asked if Tsafendas had said anything about killing the Prime Minister. He is sure he said that Tsafendas called Dr. Verwoerd “Hitler’s best student,” and that he believed it would be justifiable for someone to kill him because he was a tyrant. He does not remember telling the policeman about the spitting incident, which he had forgotten until it was mentioned to him by the author, but he presumes that he did.⁶⁷⁷³

Vasilis Perselis remembers the interview very well, “I was asked about the gun and told them he asked me for a pistol for self-protection because he lived in a rough area, so I referred him to Manolis (Mastromanolis) and to Nikolakis (Mavronas). I had nothing else to do with the gun issue after that.”

Perselis says he was asked if he thought “there was something wrong with him

⁶⁷⁷¹ John Reed’s book ‘Ten Days that Shook the World,’ published in 1919, is a first-hand account of the 1917 October Revolution in Russia.

⁶⁷⁷² Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014.

⁶⁷⁷³ Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012.

(Tsafendas).” He does not recall his exact answer, but he remembers Tsafendas as being “a very clever man, not mad at all, one hundred per cent normal.” He remembers Tsafendas telling him that he had got a job which was not paying him well and he had to wear a uniform. Perselis thought that it was in a hotel, not in the Parliament. Tsafendas had told him that he wanted to save money to go and live the rest of his life in Cuba, though he does not remember if he told the police this. He remembers Tsafendas being a Communist and considered him to be well-informed about Greek and world politics and history.⁶⁷⁷⁴

Grigoris Pouftis is certain that he told the policeman about his mad act with the Portuguese Army and that Tsafendas served in the DSE during the Greek Civil War. Pouftis also told the policeman that Tsafendas was a Communist who despised the South African Prime Minister and mentioned both the spitting gesture and the remark that Dr. Verwoerd was ‘Hitler’s best student.’ What he did not reveal for sure was that they had sung Communist songs together.

Pouftis remembers being asked if Tsafendas said anything about killing the Prime Minister. “I told him ‘God no; he never said anything like this.’” As for the “justifiable killing” conversation, he remembers it vaguely but cannot remember whether or not he told the policeman. Also, he remembers going to the township, but doesn’t remember if he told the police. Pouftis does not remember being asked about Tsafendas’s mental state, but his own memory is of “an ordinary man, soft-spoken, knowledgeable and passionate about politics.” He remembers Tsafendas telling him he wanted to go and live in Cuba, but he doesn’t remember if he said that to the police.⁶⁷⁷⁵

Ioannis Speis did not associate much with Tsafendas but he spoke to him from time to time and saw him every day on the Eleni. He does not remember everything he was asked but he recalls being questioned about Tsafendas’s character and asked his opinion of him. He believes that he told the police approximately the following: “I never noticed anything wrong with him; he was very talkative and friendly.” Speis considered Tsafendas to be “a proper gentleman.” He was familiar with hawkers selling their wares on ships but thought Tsafendas “did not look like other hawkers.” He saw him as “a proud, intelligent man with lots of dignity. He never asked for anything from the crew and was always prompt with our financial dealings.” Speis knew that Tsafendas had taken some of his crewmates to a township, but he had not gone along. However, he was one of those to whom Tsafendas demonstrated how to fish for lobster, but he did not reveal that to the police.⁶⁷⁷⁶

⁶⁷⁷⁴ Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015.

⁶⁷⁷⁵ Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009.

Dimitrios Stavrianos does not remember exactly what he was asked and what he told the police. He remembers Tsafendas, but he did not associate with him very much and therefore thinks he could not have told the police a lot about him. He remembers Tsafendas as a “normal man; very well-dressed and well-mannered” who “did not show any signs of being mentally disturbed. He never behaved like a mad man or said anything to suggest that something might be wrong with him. None of us ever thought that he could be mad.”⁶⁷⁷⁷

Emanuil Tsabouniaris remembers the questioning very well. He was asked whether Tsafendas asked him for a gun or a knife. He replied that, “Tsafendas had seen I had a knife and asked me to sell it to him. I did not do so because I liked it and it was a souvenir.” The policeman then asked, “Do you still have it?” and he replied, “Yes.” Tsabouniaris said it was in his suitcase and offered to bring it for him, but the policeman replied, “No, that won’t be necessary.”

Although he does not remember exactly what he said, he presumes he told the police what he remembers about Tsafendas to this day:

“[Tsafendas was] a very funny and good hearted man, a very friendly, talkative and polite person, a true gentleman. Always very well-dressed and always very courteous. Everyone liked him. He was certainly perfectly fine, impossible to have been insane. Impossible! This man was definitely not insane. I could swear to God that he was not insane... He was always very prompt with our financial dealings, not like other hawkers who I or the other guys had met. He was completely different; he talked more like a teacher than a hawker. He used nice words and had excellent command of the vocabulary. He seemed like a very well-educated and knowledgeable man; a sophisticated man...

... The only thing I found strange was that his profession of a hawker did not match his character. He was very educated and very polite for a hawker. I always believed that something must be going on with this man, that he couldn’t be just a hawker. I am sure he could have found a much better job. I thought that perhaps he could have a reason for doing this job; as a cover for something else, so he could walk freely around the harbour and aboard ⁶⁷⁷⁶ Ioannis Speis in a personal interview, 12 July 2015.

⁶⁷⁷⁷ Dimitris Stavrianos in a personal interview, 18 January 2015.

the ships. We discussed this with some of the guys and they also thought that there must be something happening with him. The thing that impressed me more was that he was very proud. He was doing the job with pride, not like a beggar or trying to make you buy in a sleazy way. He was a true gentleman.”⁶⁷⁷⁸

Michalis Vasilakis remembers telling “pretty much everything” he knew about Tsafendas. “The only things I remember not telling him for sure is that he sang partisan songs with us and he gave me this anti-apartheid book. None of us mentioned these things, not even those who had not participated in the singing but just knew about it.” He remembers telling the police that Tsafendas took them to the township but not whether that they had tea in a Black family’s house. He told them that Tsafendas was a Communist who had also fought with the Communists in the Greek Civil War and he is pretty certain that he also told the policeman and that he had “played the fool” so as not to serve in the Portuguese army.

He remembers mentioning that Tsafendas had spat at Dr. Verwoerd’s photograph – it was Vasilakis who showed him the picture - and called the prime minister “Hitler’s best student.” The most difficult part of the interview was when he had to explain to the policeman what tyrannicide was after telling him about Tsafendas’s belief that Dr. Verwoerd’s assassination would be justifiable because he was a tyrant. The interview lasted about thirty minutes and he spent at least half of it explaining the philosophy of tyrannicide as understood by the ancient Greeks.

He said that Tsafendas had “a very distinctive way of talking. It was slow, but very intelligent and sophisticated ... He was talking like a professor. It was more likely for us to not be able to follow him than him to follow us. We spent hours talking about politics and he was leading the conversation; none of us knew anything about apartheid at the time.” He does not remember being asked about Tsafendas’s mental state, but his own opinion is that he was “surely one hundred and ten per cent sane. There is absolutely no way Dimitri to have been mad. He definitely played mad to not be executed.”⁶⁷⁷⁹

Emanuil Mastromanolis’s statement was found in the archives but he stated to the author that he told the police much more than appeared in his statement. As we have seen from his statement, the police interview with Mastromanolis appeared to focus solely on the gun, but he told the author that discussion of the pistol lasted only about five minutes and the rest of the time was spent answering questions about Tsafendas's character and activities.

⁶⁷⁷⁸ Emanuil Tsabouniaris in personal interview with the author, 14 June 2016.

⁶⁷⁷⁹ Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

Mastromanolis acknowledged that his statement found in the archives is accurate and was what he told the policeman. He claims, however, that he lied in saying he thought the gun was a toy, because he was actually "under the impression that Mavronas's pistol was a real one." He had heard from Perselis that Mavronas had just bought a gun while in Cape Town and he was given the impression that it was real since Perselis also assumed it was real. Mavronas, who was only seventeen, had boasted about buying the gun and believed it was authentic. He was very surprised when the crew told him that it was just a gas pistol because it looked and felt authentic.⁶⁷⁸⁰

Mastromanolis thought that Mavronas might be willing to sell it to Tsafendas for a quick profit and only found out that the gun was fake when he suggested this to the boy. Mavronas proposed selling the gun to Tsafendas anyway, since Tsafendas had told everyone he needed a pistol to "scare people off," not to kill anyone, and it could do such a job. Mastromanolis agreed reluctantly, considering it would meet Tsafendas's requirement for a weapon just "to scare people off". Mastromanolis claims that he couldn't have told the police he was willing to sell Tsafendas a real firearm, which was why he called it a toy while hiding his impression that it was real.⁶⁷⁸¹

After the Eleni left Cape Town for Kuwait, according to Mastromanolis and Perselis, they and Mavronas discussed the issue of the gun's sale to Tsafendas. Their initial thought was that if they were asked, they would tell the police that they believed Tsafendas was looking for a fake gun, since he had told them that he only wanted to "scare people off." Eventually, they decided to say they intended to play a joke on Tsafendas as they believed he would not be able to tell whether or not the gun was real.⁶⁷⁸²

Mastromanolis was surprised and relieved when he realised that the policemen were less interested in the gun than in Tsafendas's activities and character. He said talk about the gun lasted no more than five minutes while the rest of the time was spent discussing Tsafendas. Very early in the questioning, he was asked about a comment which Tsafendas attributed to him in his statement, that "the South Africans need a good whipping." Mastromanolis was surprised and concluded that Tsafendas must have talked extensively to ⁶⁷⁸⁰ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016.

⁶⁷⁸¹ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016.

⁶⁷⁸² Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016; Vasilis Perselis in a personal interview, 14 January 2015.

the police since this was something he had said after Tsafendas took him and some of the seamen to a township in Cape Town. He denied to the policeman making such a remark, but he admitted to the author that Tsafendas had told the truth to the police and that he did make such a statement after they left the township. Mastromanolis does not remember if he was asked or if he told the police about the visit to the township.⁶⁷⁸³

Mastromanolis does not remember everything he told the police, but he described Tsafendas as being a “normal, intelligent person.” He remembered Tsafendas as “a kind man, very much into politics and very well-informed about what was happening around the world. I’ve met many men, all around the world, and some of them were mad. I can say for sure that this man was not insane. There was nothing ever to make me believe that he might be insane. It was impossible for him to have been insane,” and he believes this is what he told the police. He clearly remembers the police asking if Tsafendas had said anything about killing Dr. Verwoerd. He had replied, “No, never. If he had said such thing, I would have gone to the police.”⁶⁷⁸⁴

THE MISSING STATEMENTS FROM THE ELENI

As we have seen, it is indisputable that witnesses’ statements have gone missing from the Commission’s record at the National Archives of South Africa. However, the crew of the Eleni gave vital information to the police about Tsafendas, and their missing statements are of great importance. This is what the police found out from the Eleni men:

- Tsafendas despised Dr. Verwoerd. He spat at a picture of him and denounced him as “Hitler’s best student” because of the similarities between his national policies and those of Adolf Hitler.
- Three days before it happened, Tsafendas told the men that if Dr. Verwoerd were to be assassinated, such an act would be morally justifiable because Dr. Verwoerd was a tyrant and a dictator.
- Tsafendas was a passionate Communist and fought with the Communists in the Greek Civil War.

⁶⁷⁸³ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016.

⁶⁷⁸⁴ Emanuil Mastromanolis in a personal interview, 29 February 2016.

- Tsafendas constantly spoke about politics and strongly opposed apartheid.
- Tsafendas took some seamen to a black township in Cape Town to show them the hardships and injustices of apartheid.
- The crew of the Eleni, to a man, believed Tsafendas was perfectly sane; none had noticed anything wrong with him.

All of the above information was important to the Commission, especially Tsafendas's remark about justifiable homicide. This was of particular relevance, given that the Commission was trying to establish how Dr. Verwoerd's death came to be discussed three days before the assassination. However, none of this information is included in the Report. The information was also important to explain Tsafendas's motive, but it was not used for that purpose either.

The author cannot know whether these statements were suppressed by the Commission or were never given to the Commission by the police. Both withheld information in this case, so either alternative is possible. What makes the police the likelier culprit is that the Commission only used information for its Report from some of the four statements found in the archives and there is no mention at all of anything from the other statements. This suggests that the Commission was probably not in possession of any other statements. However, if this was so, did the Commission not wonder what happened to the rest of the crew's statements?

Surely the Commission did not believe that the South African police went all the way to Venice to interview three sailors about the sale of the gun and one about rumours of Dr. Verwoerd's death. The Commission was aware that there were thirty-eight men in the tanker crew and any one of them could have had important evidence about Tsafendas or about why Dr. Verwoerd's death was being discussed. The Commission must have been aware of how thorough the police had been in their investigation, even questioning people who had not seen Tsafendas for many years or who had a very brief acquaintance with him, such as James Johnston.

The Commission must have wondered whether the sailors were asked if Tsafendas had said anything about murdering Dr. Verwoerd, or what they knew, if anything, about the prime minister's death being discussed at the tanker. These were crucial matters but only one of the thirty-eight-man crew seems to have been questioned about them. This must have seemed unthinkable to the legal mind of the Commission, yet it seems it made no move to seek answers. An independent conclusion must be that the Commission either accepted without question what it was given by the police, or that it received the missing statements and suppressed them, as it did with much other evidence. Whether the police or the Commission were to blame is less important than the effect of the blackout, namely that the Commission presented a totally distorted picture of how the conversation regarding Dr. Verwoerd's death probably began, leaving hanging questions to which the Eleni crew had provided mostly plausible answers. At the same time, the Commission's Report also does not contain some other very important information taken from the crew, such as the township visit, Tsafendas's participation in the Greek Civil War and his spitting gesture. The issue of the missing evidence from the archives and the Commission's Report is discussed in the section "missing evidence and the role of General van den Bergh" of this chapter.

CONCLUSION

The Commission's description of events surrounding the Eleni is inaccurate, tendentious, lacking evidence in many crucial aspects and in parts wildly speculative; it is notable more for what it omits than for what it contains. The Report, as written, supported the proceedings of the summary trial and doubtless met with the approval of the government in its determination to have Tsafendas proved insane and without a political motive. The Report lacked reference to the testimony of several Eleni crew members. Twelve men testified to the author that they and the rest of their colleagues who knew Tsafendas were all questioned by the police in Venice, yet only four statements from the thirty-eight-men crew were found in the national archives. Two other seamen who were not questioned by the South African police but were present when the questioning took place in Venice, confirmed this. However, there is no mention of what these people said in the Report.

The Report deals at length with the fact that rumours of Dr. Verwoerd's death were discussed on the Eleni. It is the most intriguing element of the Report. However, the Commission fails to give a solid answer or even a plausible explanation as to why this was so, speculating about the crew's discontent when hard evidence was available as to how the issue almost certainly arose. Several sailors had testified to the police that Tsafendas spoke of a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd being morally justified since he was a tyrant and a dictator. This happened only hours before the dockside rumours about his death. The link was obvious. Yet the assassination talk is not mentioned by the Commission. Clearly talk of a morally justifiable assassination would contradict what was heard at the summary trial and was not what the authorities wanted the people to know.

Also omitted were the facts that Tsafendas had participated in the Greek Civil War with the Communists, that he considered Dr. Verwoerd to be a tyrant, a dictator and Hitler's best student, that he spat in contempt upon seeing a photograph of Dr. Verwoerd and that he took some of the sailors to a poor, black township in Cape Town. Again, none of these things fitted with the portrayal of Tsafendas in the summary trial or the one that the Commission was trying to build.

The missing statements also contained important information about Tsafendas's character. Many of the sailors had spent time with him on every one of the forty-two days that he visited the ship, up to three days before the assassination. Tsafendas felt comfortable with the crew, partly because some of them were fellow Communists but also because they were not South Africans and were only in the country temporarily. None of the positive comments about Tsafendas contained in the men's statement are mentioned in the Report.

The author is not in position to know whether or how much information was available to the Commission. However, it is not of major importance whether it was the police of the Commission itself which withheld the information. What is important is that evidence was suppressed and therefore the Report does not give an accurate account of what happened on the Eleni in the days preceding Dr. Verwoerd's assassination. The Eleni issue stands out as proof that important information was suppressed throughout the case against Tsafendas in order to depict him in an erroneous and disadvantageous light and to mislead the public regarding important aspects of the assassination.

THE VERGOS INCIDENT

Paragraphs 28 and 29 of Chapter II C deal with Tsafendas's physical fight with Nick Vergos. Vergos was described by the Commission as a key witness. On 12th October 1966, the front page of the Daily Dispatch announced "KEY WITNESS FOUND,"⁶⁷⁸⁵ while The Cape Times front-paged "IMPORTANT WITNESS TRACED."⁶⁷⁸⁶ The Commission had appealed to the media for help in locating the fifty-four-year-old (or sixty-one-year old according to other reports) Greek-born Vergos, who was thought to have "vital information" regarding Tsafendas. Six hours after the appeal was issued, Vergos walked into the office of the Rand Daily Mail in Johannesburg.⁶⁷⁸⁷ However, this important witness with "vital information" about Tsafendas, someone the Commission had spent much effort to locate, was not asked to testify at Tsafendas's summary trial. This is the Commission's Report of events involving Vergos:

His next employers were Messrs. Frazer and Chalmers, at Mandini, Zululand. There he worked as a fitter and turner from 19th April, 1965 to 19th May, ' 1965, when he was dismissed after a fight with a Greek, a certain Nicholas Vergos. In the fight Tsafendas sustained cuts on the arm and stomach, and he laid a charge of assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm against Vergos.

On 12th May, 1965, the trial took place. Vergos testified that, since Tsafendas had knocked him down without any provocation, he had defended himself with his razor when Tsafendas attempted to assault him again. Vergos was found not guilty since the magistrate held the view that Tsafendas had been the assailant. Tsafendas was most dissatisfied with the verdict (Tsafendas was the interpreter).⁶⁷⁸⁸

After this fight Vergos told Mr. J. J. Botha, the Security Officer of the S.A. Pulp and Paper Industries, that Tsafendas was a dangerous communist. Mr. Botha says that he conveyed this information to the South African Police at Nyoni, but not one of the policemen who were serving there at that time has any recollection of this. Sergeant Fourie of Nyoni admits that Vergos told him that Tsafendas was a "communist bastard," but he regarded this as an insult and not as an accusation, and consequently made no report on the matter. Vergos confirmed

⁶⁷⁸⁵ Daily Dispatch, 12 October 1966: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd: Key witness found.'

⁶⁷⁸⁶ The Cape Times, 12 October 1966: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd Inquiry: Important witness traced.'

⁶⁷⁸⁷ The Cape Times, 12 October 1966: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd Inquiry: Important witness traced.'

⁶⁷⁸⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 28.

*that he had made this allegation, but could not really give any sound reason for his imputation. He said that he had based it mainly on the fact that Tsafendas could speak so many languages.*⁶⁷⁸⁹

The Report gives Vergos's version of events and not Tsafendas's. However, it is evident from the statements taken by the police and the Commission that Vergos had not been entirely honest with the police nor in court about the incident. According to Christoffel van Vuuren, a security officer at the paper factory, Vergos was known to his fellow workers as "Nicky the Greek, with a razor."⁶⁷⁹⁰ Tsafendas said Vergos often played idly with a razor. Tsafendas also said Vergos was a fascist, a racist and a bully, especially towards the African workers. He would often order the Africans to run personal errands for him, such as fetching cigarettes. Tsafendas told Vergos to stop using them as his personal servants. For his part, Vergos told Tsafendas to stop talking to the workers about Communism and against apartheid; he said Tsafendas would get them all dismissed or arrested. However, Tsafendas ignored him and they often argued.⁶⁷⁹¹

What was the reason for the fight? Tsafendas heard that Vergos had hired two African employees to do some work for him in his house, then refused to pay them, claiming that they had not done a good job. When they protested, he threatened them with the loss of their jobs and since the work they had done was illegal, they could not complain to the police or the company.⁶⁷⁹² One day in the company canteen, Tsafendas told Vergos he should pay the two men. Vergos refused and swore at Tsafendas, who then slapped Vergos twice in the face; Vergos fell to the floor and the fight stopped and both men left the canteen.⁶⁷⁹³ Tsafendas went to his room, where Vergos appeared soon afterwards with a knife in his hand. Tsafendas told him "to get out," but Vergos slashed at him with the knife. Tsafendas said in his statement to the police, "He gave me one stab in my hand which was trying to ward off the ⁶⁷⁸⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 29.

⁶⁷⁹⁰ Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren statement to the police, 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁷⁹¹ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁹² Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁷⁹³ Demetrio Tsafendas's statement in the court regarding the incident, 14 May 1965. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van saak dossier Nyoni R.A.A. 14 May 1965. NASA; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

blow, then aimed another blow at my stomach. I jumped away and he only scratched me. I then pushed him away.”⁶⁷⁹⁴

In his testimony to the police, Vergos failed to explain why the dispute arose, saying Tsafendas attacked him out of the blue and for no reason and that he did not know him until then.⁶⁷⁹⁵ This was clearly a lie as Charles Edwin Woods, the men’s supervisor, testified that even before the fight, Vergos had asked him to get rid of Tsafendas because he was a “Communist.” Tsafendas, after the fight, told Woods that their argument was over politics,⁶⁷⁹⁶ something he often argued about with Vergos. Although Woods testified that the cause of the fight was a political argument, the Commission omitted this information.

It was also before their physical fight that Vergos characterised Tsafendas as a “Communist bastard” to Jan Fourie, a sergeant of the South African police.⁶⁷⁹⁷ This comment, plus the one Vergos made to Woods, contradict Vergos’s claim that he did not know Tsafendas before the fight. It also tends to confirm Tsafendas’s assertion that their arguments were about politics and the fact that he was a Communist. If these two men had no relationship or arguments before their physical fight, why would Vergos ask their supervisor to fire Tsafendas because he was a Communist or denounce him to the police as a “Communist bastard?”

Furthermore, according to Christoffel van Vuuren’s statement to the police, Tsafendas told him that he had an argument with Vergos and they got into a brawl, but he could not remember the specific reason for the fight. Van Vuuren then called Vergos out of the recreation club and on the way to his office “Vergos admitted that he assaulted Demetrios with a razor, because the latter tried to assault him with a knife.”⁶⁷⁹⁸ This is incompatible with the version Vergos gave to the police at the time. In that statement, which was found in the archives and therefore was in the Commission’s possession, he stated that Tsafendas had ⁶⁷⁹⁴ Demetrio Tsafendas’s statement to the police regarding the incident, 7 May 1965. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van saak dossier Nyoni R.A.A. 14 May 1965. NASA.

⁶⁷⁹⁵ Nikolas Vergos’ statement in the court regarding the incident, 14 May 1965. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van saak dossier Nyoni R.A.A. 14 May 1965. NASA.

⁶⁷⁹⁶ Charles Edwin Woods statement to the police, 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁷⁹⁷ Jan Johannes Albertus Fourie statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁷⁹⁸ Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren statement to the police, 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

punched him three times in the face. He made no mention of a knife. Van Vuuren also told the police that Vergos said Tsafendas “was not Greek, but a Kaffir and a Communist.”⁶⁷⁹⁹

Nothing from van Vuuren’s statement is mentioned in the Report. Vergos also claimed in his statement that the razor he employed against Tsafendas was “sometimes used to sharpen a pencil or so.” Vergos further claimed that he passed in front of Tsafendas’s room and the door was open. Tsafendas saw him and asked him to come inside. Vergos went in and Tsafendas attacked him again, and it was then he produced the razor and slashed Tsafendas.⁶⁸⁰⁰

Tsafendas’s version in his statement to the police also fell short of the whole truth. He said, “Vergos entered the canteen swearing.” Tsafendas asked him to “behave himself” and then they fought.⁶⁸⁰¹ Vergos could not give the cause of the fight because he had used two African workers illegally, and Tsafendas did not refer to this because the Africans would have been fired or even worse for doing illegal work.⁶⁸⁰² In Tsafendas’s version to the police, Vergos and another man entered his room. Tsafendas asked them to get out and it was then that Vergos attacked him.⁶⁸⁰³

The author is not in position to know exactly what happened, but it matters a little. What is important is that Vergos had reported Tsafendas to the South African police as Communist before they fought, and that he characterised him as “the biggest Communist in the Republic,” and both statements were omitted from the Report. The Report states that Vergos told J. J. Botha, a security officer for S.A. Pulp and Paper Industries, that Tsafendas was a “dangerous Communist.” However, Botha also told the police that Vergos described Tsafendas as “the biggest Communist in the Republic of South Africa,”⁶⁸⁰⁴ however, this comment was omitted. Also missing is a statement by Mike Josias Germishuys, a sergeant in ⁶⁷⁹⁹ Christoffel Johannes van Vuuren statement to the police, 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸⁰⁰ Nicholas Vergos statement to the police regarding the incident, 7 May 1965. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van saak dossier Nyoni R.A.A. 14 May 1965. NASA.

⁶⁸⁰¹ Demetrio Tsafendas’s statement in the court regarding the incident, 14 May 1965. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van saak dossier Nyoni R.A.A. 14 May 1965. NASA.

⁶⁸⁰² None of the witnesses remembers what the two African workers had exactly done for Vergos.

⁶⁸⁰³ Demetrio Tsafendas’s statement to the police regarding the incident, 7 May 1965. K150, Vol. 3, File: Afskrif van saak dossier Nyoni R.A.A. 14 May 1965. NASA.

⁶⁸⁰⁴ Johannes Jacobus Botha statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

the South African Police at Mandini, that Vergos was “under the influence of alcohol at the time of the arrest,” i.e. after the fight.⁶⁸⁰⁵

Although the reason for the fight was not given by either Tsafendas or Vergos, it must have been known to the Commission, because, according to The Cape Times, the police on 9th September questioned several workers at the canteen where the fight took place.⁶⁸⁰⁶ It seems unlikely that the workers failed to explain the situation to the police, however much some of them might have wanted to protect Vergos, who was still working there.

One absurd element in the Vergos/Tsafendas situation is the reason Vergos gave for concluding that Tsafendas was a Communist - that he spoke many languages, an explanation the Commission treated with sufficient seriousness to include in its Report. Were all multi-linguists Communists? The only significance attachable to Vergos’s comment is that if he knew Tsafendas could speak several languages, then he must have known him before they fought.

In later life, Tsafendas would proudly display the scar caused by “fascist and racist” Vergos’s razor and a second one on his hand which he said he received during a confrontation in London in the early 1960s with members of Oswald Mosley’s fascist Union Movement. He considered both scars to be badges of honour.⁶⁸⁰⁷ ⁶⁸⁰⁵ Mike Josias Germishuys statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸⁰⁶ The Cape Times, 9 September 1966: 15, ‘Tsafendas in brawl in canteen.’

⁶⁸⁰⁷ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 29 March 2015; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

TSAFENDAS'S RELATIONSHIP WITH THE GREEK COMMUNITY

*The Greek community did not accept him as one of them.*⁶⁸⁰⁸

This is a correct statement, but it is not explained and so gives a wrong impression, although the Commission was probably not sure exactly why the Greek community did not accept Tsafendas. Far from being a blot on his character, the fact that Tsafendas was not accepted by the Greek community was in his eyes a mark of honour. Most Greeks in South Africa co-operated enthusiastically with, or at least supported, the apartheid regime, usually for commercial reasons; some even contributed financially to the National Party.⁶⁸⁰⁹ The prominent human rights Advocate George Bizos, opposed apartheid and as a result was cold-shouldered by his compatriots and seen as an embarrassment and a traitor to the community.⁶⁸¹⁰ Tsafendas was viewed in exactly the same way, or even worse. In Mozambique, too, the majority of Greeks supported the Portuguese colonialists because it was financially beneficial to them to do so.

After the assassination, the Greek communities in South Africa and Mozambique tried frantically to distance themselves from Tsafendas as far as possible. People who had never met Tsafendas and knew nothing about him speculated that he must have been insane and many declared that he was not even Greek.⁶⁸¹¹ Georgios Manidis, President of the Greek Community in Bloemfontein and a supporter of apartheid, said Tsafendas, though he had never met him, “must be insane. He does not represent the feelings of the Greeks of South Africa. Most of the Greeks in South Africa are supporters of Dr. Verwoerd.”⁶⁸¹² The Greek community in Pretoria was the first publicly to distance itself from this “infamous and reprehensible assassination.” A spokesman hastily declared that “the criminal was in no way attached to any religious or social Greek organisation and he was not recognized as a Greek.”⁶⁸¹³

Tsafendas was well-known to the Greek community in Pretoria because of his family, but mostly because of an incident in a Greek Orthodox Church in Pretoria during a service. The Greek priest praised South Africa and its apartheid policy and attacked Communism and those opposing apartheid, enraging Tsafendas. His half-brother, Victor Tsafantakis, stopped ⁶⁸⁰⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 6.

⁶⁸⁰⁹ Advocate George Bizos in Manolis Dimelas's Live and Let Live, 2007.

⁶⁸¹⁰ To Vima, 13 June 2010, 'Γιώργος Μπίζος: «Υποφέρουμε όπως εσείς στους Ολυμπιακούς».'

⁶⁸¹¹ Eleftherotipia, 4 July 2010, 'Οι Έλληνες φίλοι του απαρχάιντ.'

⁶⁸¹² Kathimerini, 7 September 1966: 1, 'Θλίψις εις την Ελληνικήν παροικίαν του Γιοχάνεσμπουργκ.'

⁶⁸¹³ Noticias, 8 September 1966: 1, 'Proseguem as investigacoes.'

him from interrupting the priest. However, when the time came for Communion, Tsafendas refused to take the sacrament or to kiss the priest's hands, as was customary. Instead, he argued quietly with the priest, saying he should be ashamed for praising apartheid. The priest politely replied that Greeks should not bite the hand that fed them in South Africa. Tsafendas said the Whites exploited the non-Whites, but life for the majority of people was far from rosy. Members of the congregation then began protesting on behalf of the priest and denouncing Tsafendas. Tsafendas remained calm and finally his family managed to pull him away.⁶⁸¹⁴

In Cape Town, a delegation of Greek leaders called on the John Vorster and assured him that Tsafendas was not of Greek origin and was not connected in any way with the Greek community in South Africa.⁶⁸¹⁵ The leader of the Greek community in Johannesburg, Peter Paizes, said he was a personal friend and admirer of Dr. Verwoerd;⁶⁸¹⁶ he spoke of his "tremendous grief" and expressed "indescribable consternation" that the assassin apparently was partly of Greek extraction.⁶⁸¹⁷

An unnamed person described as a "leading South Coast Greek businessman" gave an interview to The Daily News which represented the generally sycophantic attitude of local Greeks towards South Africa. He said, "When I arrived in South Africa some 15 years ago, I had holes in my shoes. With the help of the Government I was able to find employment, and within a matter of six years I had my own business and two cars. I am sure that I speak for all Greeks in South Africa when I say we never had it so good... we as Greeks have always had the highest regard for Dr. Verwoerd. He had done a great deal for us, allowed and given us every reason to want to be South Africans and succeed in business."⁶⁸¹⁸

Tsafendas never hid his political preferences; he was a Communist and an outspoken critic of colonialism and of apartheid. He frequently and publicly accused Greeks in South Africa and Mozambique of exploiting Black people and of being fascist and racist. He was known by the Greek community in Lourenço Marques as "The Red," and he was arrested five times by the Portuguese because of his political ideas and activities.

⁶⁸¹⁴ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸¹⁵ Sunday Times, 11 September 1966, 'Vorster gives Greeks assurance.'

⁶⁸¹⁶ To Vima, 7 September 1966: 1, 'Η δολοφονία του Φέρβειρντ: Ελληνικής καταγωγής ο δράστης.'

⁶⁸¹⁷ The New York Times, 7 September 1966: 16, 'Grief expressed by leader of Greeks in Johannesburg.'

⁶⁸¹⁸ The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 9, 'S.A. Greeks had high regard for Dr. Verwoerd.'

Tsafendas usually avoided Greeks in the diaspora but he was happy to make friends with those who obviously did not share the obsequious Greek viewpoint, such as Fotini Gavasiadis, Irene Michaletos, Ira Kyriakakis, Elias Constantaras, George Grispos and Nick Papadakis. For more about Tsafendas's interaction with the Greek community in Mozambique and South Africa see Chapter Two.

HELEN DANIELS

While in Durban he received an offer of marriage in writing from Cape Town from Miss Helen Daniels, a Coloured missionary of his church. She had received his photograph from a certain Arendse in Benoni. After further correspondence he decided to go to Cape Town. A motorist took him as far as Port Elizabeth from where he travelled to Cape Town by train, arriving there on 28th August, 1965.⁶⁸¹⁹

He immediately moved in with the Daniels family (Mr. and Mrs. Daniels and their daughter Helen).⁶⁸²⁰

Miss Daniels testified how he arrived at their home with a big hole in his jersey, and dressed untidily. Her brother fetched his luggage from the station. This consisted of a suitcase containing mainly dirty washing and another suitcase containing tools, pots and pans. She immediately lost all interest in him, and he never showed any interest in her either.

Miss Daniels testified further that he often complained of a headache, and that he could not understand why he was unable to find employment. At times he said incomprehensible things. At church services, particularly, no one could understand what he was saying. Sometime he bragged about the things he wanted to do. He told her about the court case against Vergos. His account to her was that he had knocked Vergos down and that Vergos came back with four Bantu and attacked and cut him with a razor.⁶⁸²¹

DANIELS'S APPROACH TO TSAFENDAS

The Report describes Helen Daniels's relationship with Tsafendas as it was and not as her brother presented it at the summary trial and in the Press. It makes clear that it was Helen who approached Tsafendas and not the other way around, as the brother claimed, confirming that he had lied to the court. Helen Daniels had testified freely to that effect in her statement to the police on September 15, but the Attorney-General in the summary trial did not use her statement to challenge her brother's blatantly untruthful court testimony. Nevertheless, as so often, the Commission omitted from its Report details from Daniels's statement which set out ⁶⁸¹⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 36.

⁶⁸²⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 37.

⁶⁸²¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 38.

events in a faithful light. These are extracts from her statement, while her full statement is available at Chapter Four.

“During April 1965 I was visiting friends in Boksburg. There I learned of Demitrio Tsafendas. It was told to me that they would want me to meet him, he’s a nice man. I never met him and later returned to Cape Town. When I was in Cape Town, I thought to correspond with him and wrote to my friends to find out his address... Other friends of mine went on holiday to Durban and I then wrote a letter to Tsafendas and asked my friends to give this to him. Our preacher is in Durban and I hoped to trace Tsafendas through the church.

... I wrote my letter during the June holidays in 1965 and received a reply from him on July 10, 1965. I wrote in my letter that I would like to meet and wanted to marry him. His answer was that he wanted to meet me first before giving me a positive answer. I wrote to him again - four letters – all of which he answered. I sent him a picture, but he did not send me one in return. He sent word that he would come to Cape Town for our church conference - it would be in November 1965. I lived with my parents and on August 28, 1965 - he arrived at my parents’ house ... We had a spare room and gave him lodging.”⁶⁸²²

Helen Daniels was a highly respected minister in her Church and the way she heard about Tsafendas suggests that he, too, was highly thought of by their fellow church members. Patrick O’Ryan said that Tsafendas was described to him by a fellow church-goer as a “highly cultured gentleman, a very refined gentleman who speaks seven languages.”⁶⁸²³ It is clear that the members of the Church admired and respected Tsafendas before the assassination. The fact that Daniels went to considerable trouble to contact him, seeking his address, dispatching a letter with a friend, then sending him four more letters and a picture of herself, implies that she expected to meet a good man who had been warmly recommended by her friends.

TSAFENDAS’S DIRTY CLOTHES

The Report states that Tsafendas was dressed untidily, that his jersey had a hole in it and that he had dirty clothes in one of his suitcases. Helen Daniels’s brother, her sister-in-law and three other witnesses made similar statements at the summary trial. Nickolas Nel, who had an argument with Tsafendas when they worked at F.A. Poole Engineering, testified that he “had a messy and dirty appearance,”⁶⁸²⁴ landlady Wilhelmina de Vos described Tsafendas as “dirty,”⁶⁸²⁵ and Gillian Clare Lieberman, personnel secretary at the Marine Diamond Corporation, told the police that Tsafendas had “dirty, sloppy clothes,”⁶⁸²⁶ although she had only seen Tsafendas at work, where rough clothes would be normal. On the other hand, most of the many witnesses questioned by the police and the Commission said Tsafendas was neat, clean and well-dressed. However, none of their statements made it into the Report. Those commenting on the issue included:

⁶⁸²² Helen Dorothy Daniels statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, NASA.

⁶⁸²³ Patrick O’ Ryan in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes.

1. South African Police Col. van Wyk, who questioned people in Rhodesia and Mozambique who knew Tsafendas. He wrote in his report that Tsafendas “was always neatly dressed.”⁶⁸²⁷
2. Violet Irene Manning was Tsafendas’s landlady for almost two months in 1965. She told the Commission about Tsafendas: “It was a serviced room but I found him making his own bed. When he came to me he was well-dressed, well-spoken, and gave a good impression. From his general appearance he appeared to be a businessman. When he paid me, he had a bundle of notes and I took him to be a man of means.”⁶⁸²⁸
3. Ian Boswell testified that Tsafendas was “at all times neatly dressed and never gave the impression of being destitute.”⁶⁸²⁹
4. Gideon Cloete, an official at the Department of Labour, testified that Tsafendas “was neatly dressed and had a clean appearance.”⁶⁸³⁰
5. Jacobus Bornman, Tsafendas’s flatmate for six-seven weeks, stated that “according to my observation, Tsafendas was a gentle person. He was neat in his person, but his eating ⁶⁸²⁴ Nikolaas Jacobus Nel statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸²⁵ Wilhelmina Sophia de Vos statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸²⁶ Gillian Claire Liebermann statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸²⁷ Col. van Wyk’s report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁸²⁸ Violet Irene Manning statement to the COE, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, File: 1/5. Subject: Suid Afrikaanse polisie. NASA.

⁶⁸²⁹ Ian James Murdock Boswell statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64. NASA.

⁶⁸³⁰ Gideon Jacobus Cloete testimony at Tsafendas’s summary trial, 19 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10. NASA.

habits were not up to scratch.”⁶⁸³¹

6. Pieter Benjamin Geldenhuys, employment officer at the Department of Labour in Cape Town, interviewed Tsafendas twice. He told the police that Tsafendas was “neatly dressed” and he “never got the impression that there was mentally anything wrong with him or that he acted abnormally.”⁶⁸³²
7. Redvers Quintin Wakfer worked with Tsafendas at the Power Station in Cape Town and testified that he was “neatly dressed.”⁶⁸³³
8. Edward Furness testified that Tsafendas “was well-dressed and appeared to be wealthy.”⁶⁸³⁴
9. Katerina Pnema, his half-sister, testified that Tsafendas “was well dressed and gave a good appearance,” although as far as she could see, he had no visible means of support.⁶⁸³⁵ She later stated that Tsafendas was always well dressed and she never saw him wearing dirty clothes except when he was coming back from work.⁶⁸³⁶
10. Sidney Wiehand, a senior messenger at the House of Assembly was one of three messengers who interviewed and appointed Tsafendas. He said that in order to be hired, a messenger “must always be neat,” indicating that Tsafendas fitted that description.⁶⁸³⁷

In Europe, Horst Hartmann, senior personnel officer at the heavy engineering company Fries & Son in Frankfurt, where Tsafendas worked as a welder, said in a newspaper interview that was published by the South African press and was in the Commission’s possession, “He drove up here in a big, battered American car. He looked like a successful businessman. I thought he was more likely to apply for an executive job than as a welder.

⁶⁸³¹ Jacobus Johannes Borman statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸³² Pieter Geldenhuys statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 1, Sub File: 1/1, Department of Labour. NASA.

⁶⁸³³ Redvers Wakfer statement to the police, 6 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub File: 1/5, Subject Suid Afrikaanse Polisie. NASA.

⁶⁸³⁴ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸³⁵ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁸³⁶ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸³⁷ Sydney William Wiehand testimony to the COE, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

Well-dressed and well-mannered, he was extremely courteous, a very pleasant man...he made a good impression and he spoke good German, so I took him on.”⁶⁸³⁸

Furthermore, according to the testimony at the summary trial of Merle Daniels, Helen’s sister-in-law, the day Tsafendas arrived at their house, he immediately asked her to wash his clothes, which suggests that he was aware of their condition and was not habitually a dirty person. She also testified that Tsafendas’s clothes were always clean after that first day.⁶⁸³⁹ Joyce Dick, one of Helen Daniels’s best friends at the time, stated to the author that whenever she saw Tsafendas, “he was always very neatly dressed.”⁶⁸⁴⁰ Reuben O’Ryan lived with Tsafendas in the same house for five months and kept in touch with him for another year and he also knew Helen Daniels well. He told the author Tsafendas “was always very clean and well-dressed, apart from when he was coming home from work. That was the only time I saw him wearing dirty clothes. He always wore nice clothes; he was a clean person and always shaved.”⁶⁸⁴¹ Stanley O’Ryan, Reuben’s brother also remembers Tsafendas as “clean and well-dressed person.”⁶⁸⁴²

The author asked forty-four witnesses who knew Tsafendas well about the way he was dressed. Only two of them, Andreas Babiolakis and Costas Poriadis, said that they once saw Tsafendas looking neglected and wearing a torn shirt. However, that was on the day he was released from jail in Beira in February 1965. Having just spent several days in a prison cell, wearing the same clothes every day and being beaten up, he could hardly have appeared otherwise. Both witnesses said this was the only time they saw Tsafendas looking less than perfectly dressed.⁶⁸⁴³ None of the rest said Tsafendas was of a dirty or neglected appearance. Indeed, the vast majority remembered him as dressing well and looking like a gentleman. It is not possible to reproduce here more than a hundred statements, but the following are representative of those who knew Tsafendas well:

1. Father Nikola Banovic in 1961, lived in the same house as Tsafendas for four months and in a house next door for another two or three months. He saw Tsafendas virtually every day and says he was “always a very clean person and well-dressed, wearing a different

⁶⁸³⁸ Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, ‘Assassination a one man’s job – says Vorster.’

⁶⁸³⁹ Marle Daniels’s testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁸⁴⁰ Joyce Dick in a personal interview, 6 August 2016.

⁶⁸⁴¹ Reuben O’ Ryan in a personal interview, 15 April 2016.

⁶⁸⁴² Stanley O’ Ryan in a personal interview, 9 April 2015.

⁶⁸⁴³ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Costas Poriadis in a personal interview, 5 April 2016.

hat each day.”⁶⁸⁴⁴

2. Mary Eendracht, Tsafendas’s first cousin, knew him since he was five years old, grew together in Mozambique and she spent a lot of time with him in Pretoria in 1963-4. She insists that Tsafendas was always well-dressed and clean. She was impressed by his suits and Tsafendas told her that most of them were bought in Europe. “He was always well-dressed, very often wearing a hat, and was a very clean person. “He was very fussy with clean hands when he was a child, and I think he was also like this when he grew up, but I can’t remember for sure.” ⁶⁸⁴⁵
3. Fotini Gavasiadis saw Tsafendas virtually every day for nine months in 1963-4. She told the author that it is “nonsense” to say Tsafendas was not well-dressed or dirty, that in fact he always very well dressed and clean. “Sometimes it took him longer than it took me to get ready, trying to find a more suitable hat or tie. He adored hats and ties. He never wore the same clothes for two days in a row and when it was hot he would even change twice per day. He adored hats and ties.”⁶⁸⁴⁶
4. Ira Kyriakakis, who grew up with Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques and remained a lifelong friend, described as “absolutely absurd” claims that Tsafendas was not well-dressed and clean. “He was always very well dressed; since he was a child. He looked like a gentleman. He used to wear hats he had bought from all over the world. He loved hats and he must have had tens of them. He came back to Lourenço Marques in the 1960s and brought me a hat for a present from Lisbon.” ⁶⁸⁴⁷
5. Helen Grispos was another who grew up with Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques, and her mother was the best friend of Tsafendas’s step-mother. “He was always very well dressed, even as a child; his step-mother always looked after him. When he visited us in the 1960s, I remember he wore a big hat he said he had bought somewhere in Europe. I don’t remember what he was wearing, but I remember the hat. It was very distinctive. He was certainly well-dressed.”⁶⁸⁴⁸
6. Irene Michaletos met Tsafendas in 1964 in Beira and saw him often until 1965. She remembers him being “always well-dressed and clean.”⁶⁸⁴⁹
7. Antony and John Michaletos, Tsafendas’s cousins and sons of Artemis Michaletos, ⁶⁸⁴⁴ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

⁶⁸⁴⁵ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014.

⁶⁸⁴⁶ Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015.

⁶⁸⁴⁷ Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁴⁸ Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013.

⁶⁸⁴⁹ Irene Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

- Tsafendas's aunt and his father's sister who brought him up in Egypt. They first met Tsafendas in 1951 in Lourenço Marques and got to know him between 1963 and 1965 in Mozambique. They both remember Tsafendas being "always well-dressed and clean."⁶⁸⁵⁰
8. Andreas Babiolakis knew Tsafendas since they were children and had lived in the same house as him in Beira for about two-three months. He finds the thought that he had a dirty and neglected appearance as "absurd." He recalls that Tsafendas "had a shower every morning when he woke and in the evening when he returned from work. He believed that he sweated in the night, so he had one in the morning."⁶⁸⁵¹
 9. Costas Chagios, a Cape Town café owner, knew Tsafendas for more than a year as a frequent patron of his café. He remembers Tsafendas as being "always well dressed and clean."⁶⁸⁵²
 10. Alexandra Vaporidis knew Tsafendas for about six months in Istanbul. She was impressed by his many hats and remembers that a lot of people commented about how neatly Tsafendas dressed. "I remember him coming to the church always wearing a tie."⁶⁸⁵³
 11. Peter Protoulis was a supplier of foodstuffs to the tanker Eleni. He met Tsafendas on board and says, "I was very impressed by the way he was dressed. He always wore a suit and very often a tie and a hat. I never show him wearing the same clothes two days in a row."⁶⁸⁵⁴
 12. Elias Constantaras met Tsafendas in 1965 in Cape Town and knew him up to his arrest. He recalls Tsafendas being well dressed and clean, often wearing suits and hats.⁶⁸⁵⁵
 13. Peter Peroglou and his wife Pamela Abrahams ate at the same place as Tsafendas for two or three months in 1966 and they remember him as always well dressed and very courteous.
 14. Nick Augustides is the son of the owner of Mike's Outfitters in Cape Town, for whom Tsafendas worked on commission for about two months in 1966. He knew Tsafendas for three-four months and remembers him as "a well-dressed man."⁶⁸⁵⁶
 15. Miltiades Kaldis knew Tsafendas for about a year, having met him in 1965 in Cape ⁶⁸⁵⁰ Antony Michaletos in a personal interview, 2 May 2016; John Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

⁶⁸⁵¹ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016.

⁶⁸⁵² Costas Hagios in a personal interview, 24 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁵³ Alexandra Vaporidis in a personal interview, 23 August 2015.

⁶⁸⁵⁴ Peter Protoulis in a personal interview, 3 August 2016.

⁶⁸⁵⁵ Elias Constantaras in a personal interview, 11 April 2015.

⁶⁸⁵⁶ Nick Augustides in a personal interview, 19 February 2016.

Town. He remembers him “looking clean and well-dressed.”⁶⁸⁵⁷

16. The thirteen Eleni crewmen were impressed with the way Tsafendas dressed. He told some of them that most of his suits were bought in Europe a few years ago and that he had not bought any new clothes since he returned to South Africa.⁶⁸⁵⁸

Personal appearance is a subjective matter. What is sloppy and dirty to one person may be casual and comfortable to another. It is germane that Tsafendas was a poor man, who often lived in basic lodgings, possibly without the facilities to wash his clothes, while the kind of jobs he did, welder and fitter, would require rough working attire. The fact is only the four people – Helen Daniels, Nel, de Vos and Lieberman - out of the two hundred the police and the Commission interviewed and another forty-four interviewed by the author, testified that Tsafendas wore dirty clothes. The vast majority not only disagreed, but stated that Tsafendas was neatly dressed, but the Commission omitted their statements.

TSAFENDAS'S STATE OF MIND

The Report contains several matters which were not mentioned by Daniels in her statement to the police, suggesting that they must have been from her testimony to the Commission, which was not found in the archives. One must assume that it was there that she spoke of Tsafendas saying incomprehensible things, talking about the Vergos fight and boasting about his future plans. Certainly, she did not mention anything like that in her statement to the police. On the contrary, she testified that: “besides his messy ways, I did not notice anything abnormal about him. There was never any indication that he was mentally abnormal. His stories about travelling abroad were interesting.”⁶⁸⁵⁹

Although the Report does not say that Daniels thought there was something wrong with Tsafendas's mind, it also does not carry her statement saying the direct opposite (“There was never any indication that he was mentally abnormal”). Indeed it seems to hint at something wrong with Tsafendas by including the reference to his saying “incomprehensible things” and baffling fellow believers by the way he talked in church. Since Daniels said nothing like this to the police, she presumably made these remarks to the Commission.

⁶⁸⁵⁷ Miltiades Kaldis in a personal interview, 12 March 2016.

⁶⁸⁵⁸ Kleanthis Alahiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁸⁵⁹ Helen Dorothy Daniels statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, NASA.

The question is what were the “incomprehensible things” Tsafendas spoke about. Patrick O’Ryan said in his statement to the police that Tsafendas spoke against apartheid, but he “did not encourage him, because we advocate the Biblical idea of subservience to a Government ...” He said Tsafendas’s “spiritual view seemed confused, but he was not spiritually or mentally disturbed.”⁶⁸⁶⁰ Far from subservient, Tsafendas believed that the Church should be revolutionary, help the people and fight against injustice; it should not support the powerful and the rich. He argued that the first Christians had rebelled against the Roman Empire and that the Church in South Africa and in Mozambique, because it had much power, should help in the people’s fight against apartheid and for the independence of Mozambique.⁶⁸⁶¹

Some members of the Christian Church were not happy with Tsafendas’s ideas, because they adhered to the idea of subservience to Government. The Commission was in possession of O’Ryan’s statement but nowhere in its Report does it mention Tsafendas’s “conflict” with the Christian Church, nor explain the matter of the “incomprehensible things.” Once again, the Report has included all that is negative about Tsafendas while omitting the positive. The Commission ignored Daniels’s statement about Tsafendas’s mental state. This testimony was important as it directly contradicted that of her brother and sister-in-law at the summary trial. The omission resulted in a skewed perspective of Tsafendas.

⁶⁸⁶⁰ Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁸⁶¹ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

TSAFENDAS IN THE USA

Chapter II B of the Report (paragraphs 1-12) starts with Tsafendas in the USA. Mostly, it deals with his hospitalizations and his violations of immigration laws there. Almost all of this information is taken from a file on Tsafendas held by the US Immigration authorities which was given to the South Africans on September 16, by the American embassy in Cape Town. This file also contained the Grafton State Hospital report, which has been used extensively to reconstruct Tsafendas's movements while in the USA.⁶⁸⁶²

An important issue here is that vital information has been omitted from the Commission's Report. On September 9, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Cape Town received a secret telegram from the South African embassy in Washington, DC. It stated that a "very reliable source with first-hand knowledge" informed the embassy that the US Immigration authorities had a file on Tsafendas. That Tsafendas's file contained "full particulars" of his time in the United States, including the Grafton State Hospital report. The telegram stated that Tsafendas "is understood to have shown under psychiatric treatment that he was unstable though not (not)⁶⁸⁶³ insane, but type of man who would easily be used as instrument of Communist or hostile organizations. Impression of US Immigration people at the time was that he had been manipulated and was under influence of someone or some organization. He was subsequently deported to Europe."⁶⁸⁶⁴

It is indisputable that the Commission was in possession of this telegram, since it was found in the Commission's files deposited at the national archives, yet the Commission ignored it. Here is a prime example of the Commission picking and choosing evidence to suit its purpose. The Report goes into detail concerning the unlikeliest rumours attached to Tsafendas – for example that he was wanted for murders and assaults in various countries –⁶⁸⁶⁵ but it makes no mention of a crucial belief regarding Tsafendas's mental state held by the US Immigration authorities. This was no rumour, but the considered opinion of American governmental officials who had dealt with Tsafendas for five years. The US Immigration authorities knew that Tsafendas had been hospitalized and that he had faked mental illness. Their opinion must have been taken after due consideration and must surely have been worth ⁶⁸⁶² Letter of the USA Embassy in Cape Town to the South African Security Branch, 3 October 1966. Correctional Service. Subject: Demitrio Tsafendas. File: 80/0043 A123 Vol. 1. NASA.

⁶⁸⁶³ This is exactly how it appears in the telegram. There is a second 'not' within brackets.

⁶⁸⁶⁴ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Washington to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

⁶⁸⁶⁵ Chapter II B, Paragraph 43.

examining by the Commission if only because those authorities had dealt with Tsafendas for several years, longer than any other official body connected with him.

Furthermore, in Chapter IV, Paragraph 4, the Commission says:

“There were also speculations that Tsafendas might have undergone brainwashing overseas in the process of which he was instructed to murder Dr. Verwoerd. The Commission could find no evidence to justify such a finding.”

The Commission then goes on to explain why this could not have happened; the explanations are perfectly logical and the study agrees with this part of the Report, which will be examined in detail later. What is surprising is that the Report refers vaguely to “speculations” about brainwashing while ignoring the opinion of the US Immigration authorities that Tsafendas was the “type of man who could easily be used as instrument of Communist or hostile organizations” and that “he had been manipulated and was under influence of someone or some organization.”⁶⁸⁶⁶ This certainly suggested at least a possibility of brainwashing.

The fact that this information did not come from just anybody, but from the South African embassy in the United States and that it quotes the US Immigration authorities is certainly worth stating and investigating. That is especially so when, as we will see, the Commission is happy to investigate numerous rumours about Tsafendas which are patently fictitious. However, to introduce a diplomatic telegram containing an official US opinion into open debate would have strengthened rumours that Tsafendas might not have been schizophrenic, after all, that he might even have been part of a Communist plot. Clearly such speculation was not in the interests of the Commission or the State.

⁶⁸⁶⁶ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Washington to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 09/09/1966. COE, Vol. 4, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

TSAFENDAS IN PORTUGAL IN 1949

In 1949, Tsafendas arrived in Portugal for the first time and was promptly arrested. The Report states: *“Apparently the Portuguese authorities would not accept Tsafendas’s refugee passport, nor his claim that he was a Portuguese subject, the result being that he was arrested at the border post Barca d’Alva on 8th February, 1949. It appears that he was afterwards detained for a long time.”*⁶⁸⁶⁷

The issue of this arrest and detention has been discussed earlier in this chapter.

TSAFENDAS AND THE PORTUGUESE ARMY

In Chapter II B, Paragraph 19, shortly after the incident mentioned above, the Report says:

“After it had been ascertained that Tsafendas was a Portuguese subject, he appeared on 6th February, 1950, before the Military Board of Inspection in Portugal and was granted exemption from military service.”

The above information, also taken by the Commission from a PIDE report given to the South African police,⁶⁸⁶⁸ is a drastically telescoped version of what happened in regard to Tsafendas and military service. According to a PIDE report that was not given to the South African police, it was while Tsafendas was held in Aljuba Prison that the Portuguese authorities discovered that he had not completed compulsory military service in the Portuguese Army. He was taken to Machine-Gun Regiment 1 in Lisbon,⁶⁸⁶⁹ where he was brought before the Military Board of Inspection. Tsafendas stated that he had been rejected by a recruiting board in Mozambique because his mother was a Coloured woman. Investigators replied that there was no racial discrimination in Portuguese East Africa, that everyone must serve and therefore he must complete his service.⁶⁸⁷⁰

The Portuguese authorities contacted the colonial administration in Lourenço Marques and were told that Tsafendas was not a deserter, that he had attended his interview

⁶⁸⁶⁷ Chapter II B, Paragraph 17.

⁶⁸⁶⁸ Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966.

⁶⁸⁶⁹ Letter of the Director of PIDE to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 4 November 1961. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁸⁷⁰ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

for military service and had indeed been rejected because his mother was Coloured.⁶⁸⁷¹ However, the law had changed since then and now every male Portuguese citizen was required to serve in the military. Thus, even if he was not a deserter, he was required to complete military service.⁶⁸⁷² Tsafendas “did not want to serve a dictatorship”⁶⁸⁷³ and with no avenue of escape, he pretended to be mad. Psychiatrists who examined him were convinced that he was mad and he was officially exempted from military service.⁶⁸⁷⁴ He was required to pay military taxes for exemption in the sum of 1,200 Portuguese escudos and his situation in Portugal was legalized.⁶⁸⁷⁵

The detailed explanation of the military service issue was omitted from the two PIDE reports given to the South Africans. However, the fact that Tsafendas had pretended to be mad in order not to serve in the Portuguese army was known to the South African police since at least six people had so testified when they were questioned.⁶⁸⁷⁶

⁶⁸⁷¹ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT

⁶⁸⁷² Letter of Tsafendas to the Ministro do Ultramar, 27 October 1962. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁸⁷³ The Cape Argus, 7 September 1966: 3. ‘Brainwashed in jail held man told Argus.’

⁶⁸⁷⁴ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁶⁸⁷⁵ Confidential Report of the Police Body of the Province of Mozambique regarding Demetrio Tsafendas. No: 726/694/PI, 3 May 1955. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁸⁷⁶ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Grigoris Pouftis in a personal interview, 28 November 2009; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

TSAFENDAS AND HIS FAMILY

*His relatives in South Africa and Rhodesia are regarded as good, law-abiding citizens. The stepmother, a brother, a sister-in-law and a brother-in-law gave evidence before the Commission. All of them made a favourable impression. According to persons who know the family in Pretoria, they were not exactly taken up with this member of the family.*⁶⁸⁷⁷

*... the fact that his family did not really accept him...*⁶⁸⁷⁸

The Commission here suggests that Tsafendas was not popular with his family and later in Chapter III while discussing his motive it claims that he was “not really accepted” by them. Both statements are inaccurate and the Commission was in possession of considerable evidence to the contrary. Admittedly, the Commission held five statements that supported its claim. The first was from Katerina Pnema who had testified that she had “very little or nothing to do with him during her lifetime” and that she considered him to be “a disgrace to the family.”⁶⁸⁷⁹ Hendrik van Loggenberg, a friend of the family, told the police that Tsafendas “was not welcome among his own people and they cast him out.”⁶⁸⁸⁰ Gladstone Dunn said in court that Tsafendas had told him that “he could not get on with his family and that they did not want to have anything to do with him.”⁶⁸⁸¹ Caroline Barbeau had testified that Tsafendas “liked to pity himself, saying that his family did not want him, but at the same time he never thanked one for any kindness shown him.”⁶⁸⁸² Interviewed by the police, John Marvis said Tsafendas had told him that his family did not want anything to do with him because his mother was Coloured.⁶⁸⁸³

It is not true that Pnema had very little to do with Tsafendas in her lifetime and she admitted to the author that she tried to distance herself as much as possible from him when questioned by the police. In fact, she had corresponded regularly with Tsafendas since he left South Africa in 1942. She travelled from Rhodesia to Pretoria at Christmas 1963 along with ⁶⁸⁷⁷ Chapter II C, Paragraph 6.

⁶⁸⁷⁸ Chapter III, Paragraph 3.

⁶⁸⁷⁹ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁸⁸⁰ Hendrik Johannes van Loggenberg statement to the police, 8 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸⁸¹ Gladstone Dunn statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸⁸² Caroline Barbeau statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Dimitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸⁸³ South African Police report regarding the activities of Dimitrio Tsafendas in Mozambique and Rhodesia. 20 September 1966. K150, Vol 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

her two little children so that she could meet him after not seeing him for twenty-two years. She then invited him to Rhodesia to meet her husband whom he did not know and she found him a job in Beira in 1964.⁶⁸⁸⁴ Clearly Pnema had considerably more to do with her half-brother than she told the police.

It is true though that Pnema considered him to be “a disgrace to the family,” which she still believes. However, this was because of his political activities, his arrests and bannings, which became widely known among her fellow Greeks. She felt directly insulted as a family member when Tsafendas criticised a boss who had employed him at the personal request of Pnema’s husband. The Commission was not aware of any of these things and thus considered her statement to the police as valid.

Dunn’s statement is partly accurate. Tsafendas’s family was not very happy with his behaviour after he came back from Europe. They had helped him enter South Africa illegally only to discover that he had brought with him banned anti-apartheid and Communist literature. The incident in the church where he argued with the priest angered and embarrassed family members. That public row in a church, along with his refusal to throw away the banned literature and his noisy voicing of his political opinions caused friction between Tsafendas and his stepmother and half-brother.

As for Marvis’s comment, this might have been made by Tsafendas out of frustration or on the spur of the moment. It was not mentioned by any of the scores of witnesses interviewed by the police and the author. The forty-four witnesses interviewed by the author all denied any suggestion that Tsafendas felt rejected by his family because of his Coloured. They insisted that the only tension between Tsafendas and members of the family stemmed from his political ideas and activities.

In the case of Hendrik Johannes van Loggenberg, he had testified that he occasionally ate at Marika’s house while Tsafendas ate there too, also that Tsafendas sometimes was a guest at his house.⁶⁸⁸⁵ The fact that Tsafendas was welcomed to the table at his family’s house and that he was also invited to van Loggenberg’s home suggests that Tsafendas’s relationship with the family could not have been exactly as van Loggenberg suggested. It is quite possible that van Loggenberg, being a good friend of Marika, might have tried to provide additional evidence distancing the family from Tsafendas, knowing that this was what they had done.

⁶⁸⁸⁴ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁸⁵ Hendrik Johannes van Loggenberg statement to the police, 8 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

However, apart from the above statements, no other evidence in the Commission's possession supported its claim regarding Tsafendas's relationship with his family. On the contrary, there was considerable contradictory evidence. First and most important, the Commission was aware that Tsafendas's stepmother, half-brother and his wife, and his brother-in-law travelled by car from Pretoria to Lourenço Marques to meet him and then took him back to South Africa. This was a generous, indeed a courageous gesture, given that Tsafendas was a Communist and banned from entering South Africa, and they knew this. What is more, Vlachopoulos bribed J.J. van den Berg, the passport official at the South African embassy in Lourenço Marques, to turn a blind eye to the fact that his brother-in-law was on the South African government Stop List and issue him with a visa.⁶⁸⁸⁶ Although the bribery was probably not known to the Commission, such an act is not something a family would risk for someone they did not care about.

Marika Tsafantakis told the Commission that "Tsafendas was favoured over the other children and sent to Middelburg because Portuguese children could only receive a proper education either there or in Swaziland."⁶⁸⁸⁷ The fact that Tsafendas was favoured over the other children and was sent to study in South Africa was confirmed to this study by his cousin Mary Eendracht and his half-sister Katerina Pnema. They said Tsafendas's father was adamant that Dimitris should be the one to go and study as he was his first child and he could not afford to send the others, too. Marika had not objected.⁶⁸⁸⁸ This is hardly something a family will do for a child they do not accept.

Marika also told the Commission that Tsafendas "had grown up as one of her children."⁶⁸⁸⁹ Her statement is confirmed by several witnesses and their testimonies were all in the Commission's possession. Katerina Pnema, his half-sister had also made a similar statement to the police; she said that growing up with Tsafendas "to all intents and purposes it ⁶⁸⁸⁶ Eleni Vlachopoulos in Manolis Dimelas's Live and Let Live, 2007; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁸⁷ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁸⁸⁸ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁸⁹ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

was understood” by “her and her brother and sisters” that “he was a member of the family... his complexion was such – as also his manner – that he passed as a European.”⁶⁸⁹⁰

Guglielmo Conte, a friend and business partner of Tsafendas’s father, who also knew Tsafendas from the day he was born, explicitly denied in an interview with the Rand Daily Mail that was in the Commission’s possession, that Dimitri was estranged from his family.⁶⁸⁹¹ Costas Michaletos, who knew Tsafendas from infancy and was his father’s best friend, told the police that “Dimetrios Tsafantakis grew up with his half-brothers and sisters and was always treated as part of the family.”⁶⁸⁹² A Confidential Report from the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali said shortly after the assassination and after having questioned people who knew Tsafendas: “It is also reliably reported that the Tsafandakis family hold a good reputation among the Greek community and there are suggestions that Michael Tsafandakis made a big mistake in attempting to raise his illegitimate son as a full member of his family.”⁶⁸⁹³

In addition to this evidence, the Commission was aware that Tsafendas upon his return to Pretoria had stayed for a few days at his half-sister’s house and that her husband Charles Nissiotis hired him to work at their café-shop.⁶⁸⁹⁴ Although this was not known to the Commission, Charles Nissiotis took Tsafendas on at his café so that he could show he was employed and domiciled on his application for permanent residence while he even gave him a letter stating that he was his “guarantor” and would be financially responsible for him while in South Africa.⁶⁸⁹⁵

After he moved out of his half-sister’s house, Vlachopoulos, his brother-in-law offered him a rent-free apartment he owned, but which was not immediately available. Then, Fotini Gavasiadis, Vlachopoulos’s twenty-five year old sister, and her husband Markos invited Tsafendas to stay with them until the apartment became available. Thus, Tsafendas ⁶⁸⁹⁰ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁸⁹¹ Rand Daily Mail, 17 September 1966, Tsafendas timid and puny as a boy.’

⁶⁸⁹² Costas Michaletos statement to the police, 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁸⁹³ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁸⁹⁴ Charles Nissiotis statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁹⁵ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

spent the next few weeks at their house. When Vlachopoulos's apartment became available, Tsafendas duly moved in. Tsafendas remained in this apartment for eight months. Nick Vlachopoulos also offered work to Tsafendas at his café-shop. Tsafendas worked there, but did it for free as a return because he was given the rent-free apartment by him. When Tsafendas was in Mozambique, he asked Vlachopoulos to help him sell some of his furniture. When the furniture was sold, Vlachopoulos gave the money to Marika and she sent them to him.⁶⁸⁹⁶ All these are hardly the things a person would do for someone who was not exactly taken up by his family. Indeed they are things one would do when one cares and wants to help someone.

Others who told the author that the Commission's conclusion was inaccurate included such members of Tsafendas's family as his half-sister Katerina Pnefma, his cousins Antony and John Michaletos, Irene Michaletos, John's wife, his first cousin Mary Eendracht and Nick Vlachopoulos's sister, Fotini Gavasiadis.⁶⁸⁹⁷ People who were very close to Tsafendas, like Ira Kyriakakis, Andreas Babiolakis, Helen Grispos, and Nick Papadakis also stated to this study that the Commission's statement is inaccurate.⁶⁸⁹⁸

On a point of fact, the Commission stated that Tsafendas's "stepmother, a brother, a sister-in-law and a brother-in-law gave evidence before the Commission." This is true only up to a point because Tsafendas's two half-sisters, Eleni Vlachopoulos and Evangelia Nissiotis, also gave evidence to the Commission. According to the Commission's interview transcript with "Tsafendas's family," both women gave evidence along with the rest of the family on the 21st of October. Their names in the transcript of their testimony appear as Mrs. Nissiotis and Mrs. Vlachopoulos.⁶⁸⁹⁹

It is true that Tsafendas was not very close to his half-brother Victor or his half-sister Evangelia, largely because of his politics. However he was close to Katerina, and very close to his half-sister Eleni and to his stepmother Marika. Above all, he worshipped and was ⁶⁸⁹⁶ Nick Vlachopoulos statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁸⁹⁷ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015; Antony Michaletos in a personal interview, 2 May 2016; John and Irene Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016; Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁸⁹⁸ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015.

⁶⁸⁹⁹ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

adored by his father.⁶⁹⁰⁰ Family relationships are often like this and we should also remember that Tsafendas had not seen his family for twenty-two years although he regularly corresponded with all of them. He sent postcards, letters and even presents on a regular basis to all the family, especially to his father, stepmother and Eleni. He wrote to his father every month and often telephoned him.⁶⁹⁰¹

Therefore, to say that the whole family was cool to him is a huge exaggeration. It is true that after the assassination Tsafendas's family distanced themselves from him and from his political ideas and activities, claiming they knew nothing of them. This was natural under the circumstances, but no family member ever said did not accept him, as the Commission claimed. It is noteworthy that the Commission omitted most of the evidence which contradicted the claim in its Report.

TSAFENDAS'S EMPLOYMENT WITH HIS FAMILY

*One of his brothers-in-law said in evidence that shortly after Tsafendas's return, he employed him to assist his wife (Tsafendas's half-sister) in their cafe. After two days, however, she dismissed him because he was too lazy.*⁶⁹⁰²

The person who gave this evidence was Charles Nissiotis, who was married to Evangelia, Tsafendas's half-sister. Tsafendas was indeed employed for a very short time at Nissiotis's café shop, but the reason he was dismissed was entirely different to the one mentioned here, though this was probably not known to the Commission. Shortly after he arrived in Pretoria, Tsafendas began working at his brother-in-law's café.⁶⁹⁰³ A couple of days later, a Sunday, Tsafendas, along with everyone from his family, attended a Greek Orthodox Church service. At the end of the service, the Greek priest spoke briefly. He welcomed a family newly arrived from Greece and went on to praise South Africa and its policy of apartheid for the opportunities they gave to people to come and work there, offering them a better life than anywhere else in the world. He then attacked Communists and other ⁶⁹⁰⁰ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁶⁹⁰¹ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁰² Chapter II C, Paragraph 6.

⁶⁹⁰³ Charles Nissiotis statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

“enemies” of the country.⁶⁹⁰⁴

Tsafendas was enraged and only his half-brother Victor stopped him from interrupting the priest. However, when the time came for Communion, Tsafendas refused to take the sacrament or to kiss the priest’s hands, as was customary. Instead, and despite the efforts of Nick Vlachopoulos and Victor Tsafantakis, he started arguing quietly with the priest. He said a priest should not get involved in politics and that he should be ashamed for praising apartheid. The priest was polite and replied that Greeks should be grateful for South Africa’s hospitality and that they should not bite the hand that fed them. Tsafendas said the Whites found things easy in South Africa because they exploited the non-Whites, but life for the majority of people was far from rosy. By this time, other members of the congregation had come forward to see what was happening and began protesting on behalf of the priest and denouncing Tsafendas. However, Tsafendas remained calm throughout, supporting his views. Finally, his family managed to pull him away from the priest.⁶⁹⁰⁵

Returning home, Tsafendas was rounded upon by his family for speaking out in public. Marika complained that he had embarrassed them all in front of everyone in the church and the whole Greek community would now hear about it. Tsafendas apologised for putting them into a difficult position and promised to keep his mouth shut from now on. However, Evangelia, fearing that they would lose their Greek customers over the church incident or that Tsafendas might start arguing with their customers, asked him to stop working at their café.⁶⁹⁰⁶

The Commission’s biggest omission is that Tsafendas had worked for nine months at the Proclamation Café of Nick Vlachopoulos, his other brother-in-law. Tsafendas worked voluntarily at the café because Vlachopoulos had given him a rent-free apartment. Tsafendas was so good at the job that Vlachopoulos offered him a permanent position with good wages, but Tsafendas refused. He did not want to take any money after accepting the free apartment. He worked full-time at the café when he was unemployed and part-time when he was at F.A. Poole Engineering.⁶⁹⁰⁷ It is possible that the Commission was not aware of this fact.

⁶⁹⁰⁴ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁰⁵ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁰⁶ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁰⁷ Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015.

TSAFENDAS'S FAMILY ABOUT THE TAPEWORM

*He (Tsafendas) said nothing to them (the family) about his alleged worm.*⁶⁹⁰⁸

This is a very important statement. It was stated in court during his summary trial that Tsafendas had a tapeworm since he was a small boy, that his step-mother was aware of its existence and was even indirectly responsible for it. Dr. Cooper had testified before the court that Tsafendas had the tapeworm since 1935 or 1936⁶⁹⁰⁹ while Dr. Muller and van Zyl testified for 1936,⁶⁹¹⁰ a time when Tsafendas lived with his parents. Louise O’Ryan, one of the witnesses for the defence, testified as follows: “... he told me that a while back, when he was a little boy, about six feet of it came down. The doctor gave him something and six feet of it came down. He was sitting on a bucket. And then he fainted on the bucket, and his mother removed it and she destroyed it, and since then nothing has ever come down.”⁶⁹¹¹ The above testimony was not challenged in court by the Attorney-General despite the obvious contradiction as Tsafendas was eighteen or seventeen when he first found out about the tapeworm according to the doctors, and a little boy according to Louise O’Ryan. As already clarified, O’Ryan was referring to Tsafendas’s stepmother, not his mother, from whom he was separated when he was a few months old.⁶⁹¹²

Tsafendas lived constantly with his family until July 17, 1937,⁶⁹¹³ but according to the Commission, Tsafendas never mentioned anything about a tapeworm to the family during all those years. It seems highly unlikely that a young boy could believe he had a tapeworm inside him but not ask his parents for help. More importantly, Tsafendas’s stepmother denied that the incident described by Louisa O’Ryan ever took place. The Commission’s transcript from the evidence given by the stepmother Marika and the other family members says:

*“Tsafendas never talked to the family about his tapeworm. According to them, he was definitely not insane.”*⁶⁹¹⁴

⁶⁹⁰⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 6

⁶⁹⁰⁹ Dr. Harold Cooper’s testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 17 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA

⁶⁹¹⁰ Dr. Hendrik Muller’s testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA; Reyner van Zyl’s testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁹¹¹ Louise O’ Ryan’s testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁹¹² See Louisa O’Ryan’s testimony in Chapter Five.

⁶⁹¹³ Report of the COE. Chapter II A, Paragraph 17. December 1966. R.P. 16/1967. Pretoria.

⁶⁹¹⁴ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

Tsafendas's half-sister Katerina Pnefma and first cousin Mary Eendracht, who lived under the same roof as Tsafendas at the time, both told the author that the incident involving Marika never took place and that Tsafendas would have certainly told his parents if he believed he had a tapeworm. Marika insisted until she died that Tsafendas was perfectly sane and that he had invented the tapeworm story so as not to be executed. Every member of his family said the same thing; no-one believed that Tsafendas really thought he had a tapeworm.⁶⁹¹⁵

The Commission's Report does not mention that Marika denied what was stated in court. Certainly it was not the Commission's responsibility to deal with what happened at the summary trial, but the obvious fact that Tsafendas had lied about the origins of the tapeworm should surely have been mentioned.

TSAFENDAS'S VISIT TO HIS HALF-SISTER IN UMTALI

*During this period he also visited his half-sister at Marandellas. He asked her for money, but she would have nothing to do with him and refused to help him.*⁶⁹¹⁶

In a personal interview with the author, Katerina Pnefma, the half-sister in question, described the Commission's statement as inaccurate, but she acknowledged that it was what she had told the police. The Commission cannot therefore be blamed for accepting her words. Pnefma did not have a very close relationship with Tsafendas; they had completely different personalities and often argued over politics, but nevertheless they both cared for each other.

When Tsafendas visited Pnefma and her husband Gerry, it became quickly obvious to them that he was as dedicated as ever to Communism and to the fight against colonialism. An argument arose when Tsafendas denounced Greeks and other Whites in Rhodesia for taking advantage of Blacks. Pnefma clearly remembers her half-brother saying he was "disgusted" by what he had seen and by the way the indigenous people were treated. As for money, Pnefma said Tsafendas did not ask her for cash or any other assistance. She does not recall exactly what she told the police, but she admits that she may have said he asked for money and she spurned him in order to distance herself from him as far as possible and to demonstrate that they were not close. She insists that Tsafendas never asked her, and as far as she knew, anyone else in the family, for money. "He asked me a couple of times to help him get a job, but never for money. He was too proud to ask me for money, but he would ask for help to get a job.”⁶⁹¹⁷

⁶⁹¹⁵ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹¹⁶ Chapter III C, Paragraph 14.

Although Tsafendas did not ask for assistance in Rhodesia, presumably because he did not need it, he did so just a few months later. Shortly after he was released from the prison in Beira where he was detained for conducting subversive propaganda for the independence of Mozambique, Tsafendas contacted Katerina and her husband. He was unemployed and asked if they could help him get a job in Mozambique. Tsafendas thus demonstrated that he was close enough to his half-sister to ask for a favour despite their political disagreements. Katerina, although unaware of his latest imprisonment, showed that she cared for her half-brother by helping to get work for him. Gerry Pnefma was friendly with the manager of a dock in Beira and persuaded him to hire his brother-in-law as an interpreter.⁶⁹¹⁸

However, Tsafendas lasted only a few days before being dismissed for urging the Mozambican workers to strike because of their working conditions. Tsafendas also denounced the manager and the company as “capitalists exploiting the workers.” The manager told Gerry Pnefma that the “only reason he did not call the police was that he did not want to cause his family problems.” He urged his friend not to help Tsafendas again because he was a dangerous Communist who could get him into trouble. Katerina Pnefma did not reveal this episode in her statement to the police and the Commission was probably unaware of it.⁶⁹¹⁹

TSAFENDAS AND HIS HALF-SISTER KATERINA PNEFMA

*On another occasion Tsafendas was most upset because, he said, he had received a letter from his sister in Rhodesia telling him that she was going to Beira for a wedding, but that she did not wish to see him at all since he was a disgrace to the family.*⁶⁹²⁰

This part is accurate, but other incidents in Tsafendas’s life of which the Commission was probably unaware provide necessary clarification. Pnefma remembers the wedding in question and confirmed in an interview with the author that she told Tsafendas she did not want to see him because he was an embarrassment to the family. This was after Tsafendas ⁶⁹¹⁷ Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹¹⁸ Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹¹⁹ Katerina Pnefma in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹²⁰ Chapter II C, Paragraph 22.

was dismissed from the job at the dock in Beira that she and her husband had helped him obtain. Furthermore, Pnema had learned in the interim of Tsafendas's arrests by the Portuguese Security Police and that he had spent three months in prison. Pnema considered Tsafendas as an embarrassment throughout her whole life, which she believes he then ruined by the assassination of Dr. Verwoerd.⁶⁹²¹ ⁶⁹²¹ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

TSAFENDAS BEFORE THE COMMISSIONTSAFENDAS'S FIRST APPEARANCE BEFORE THE COMMISSION

On 25th October, Tsafendas gave evidence before the Commission. The Commission was aware that he was quite knowledgeable about mental disorders—he also admitted to the Commission that he had read fairly extensively on the subject in order to determine what was wrong with him—and therefore adopted a somewhat sceptical attitude towards him. It is clear that his word cannot be relied upon, and that he is sufficiently intelligent to put on a fairly good act.

The Commission was able to form only a lay opinion on his mental condition, and that was—after two hours' questioning—that he was not mentally normal. He was certainly not the practically normal person described by Mr. Hartford, but apparently more normal than he was when some of the psychiatrists interviewed him.

He answered all the questions freely. At times, especially at the beginning, he stuttered slightly, sometimes he was vague, incoherent, and evasive, but otherwise his answers were logical and well formulated.

He explained that he wished to buy the pistol and knives for self-protection. He tried to relate how four Bantu had attempted to rob him on a bus one day, and that he had seen a "skolly" stab another with a knife. This evidence was given laboriously. However, he stated of his own accord that he had not yet told the Police this, and explained that he had only just remembered it. He also said that he had not deliberately planned to kill Dr. Verwoerd, but that he had been taken by a sudden impulse to do so. When he was told that he must have had the impulse when he had hidden the knives on his person, his reply was that this had been done only five minutes before the assault. To the question whether he was sorry for himself, he replied fairly promptly in the affirmative; but when he was asked whether he in any way regretted what he had done, he evaded the question by saying that the whole affair was like a dream and that he was the centre round which everything revolved. He showed no signs of remorse. When he was asked whether he was against apartheid, he replied that he was in favour of separate development, but that he was against the laws prohibiting sexual intercourse between the various groups. He utterly denied ever having been in Russia. He said that the only occasion on which he had communicated with a Russian Embassy was when he had made enquiries about permission to go to Berlin.

He denied that he had told Mr. Vercuiel that he would murder Dr. Verwoerd. He explained that Vercuiel had persecuted him. Vercuiel dismissed practically all English-speaking persons and that was the reason why he was dismissed.

He denied that he had ever tried to canvass support in London for an uprising in South Africa. His efforts, he said, were confined to Portuguese territories.

As far as the ladies with whom he had boarded and by whom he had been given notice are concerned, he explained that they were disappointed because he was not interested in them and then started a campaign against him. He stated that he sometimes took liquor, especially a buchu brandy, because it calmed down his worm or serpent for a few days. Extracts from his evidence were submitted to Dr. Wolpowitz of the Stikland Hospital as well as to Dr. A. B. van der Merwe of Stellenbosch, and both found indications of schizophrenia in the evidence.⁶⁹²²

Tsafendas gave evidence to the Commission for the first time on 25th October, 1966, five days after Judge Beyers found him unfit to stand trial. At this time, he was waiting for Vorster's decision as to his future, since he was now considered to be the State President's patient. Before we examine Tsafendas's evidence, it must be noted that his statement, not only the typed version of his remarks, but also the Dictaphone recording, are missing from the National Archives. Exactly same thing happened with the account of his second appearance before the Commission on 11th November, 1966. Therefore the author is not in position to know precisely what Tsafendas told the Commission and can only rely on what is in its Report. It should also be noted again that Tsafendas's original statement to the police and to General van den Bergh on the night of the assassination has also gone missing.

The Report starts its account of Tsafendas's evidence to the Commission with a very significant statement in which it accepts that Tsafendas is capable of pretending to be mad:

“The Commission was aware that he was quite knowledgeable about mental disorders—he also admitted to the Commission that he had read fairly extensively on the subject in order to determine what was wrong with him—and therefore adopted a somewhat sceptical attitude towards him. It is clear that his word cannot be relied upon, and that he is sufficiently intelligent to put on a fairly good act.”

The Commission then simply describes what Tsafendas said in his evidence without using Tsafendas's own words. It is germane to recall that in outlining his movements prior to the assassination, the Commission had used large excerpts from Tsafendas's statement, thus providing an obviously more authentic perspective. The Commission, conceding that its viewpoint was not an expert one, found Tsafendas to be "more normal" than he was when examined by the psychiatrists, but still not a "practically normal person." Tsafendas gave evidence for two hours, during which time the Commission found his answers to be logical and well formulated. This contradicts Dr. Cooper's diagnosis that Tsafendas was unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, as well as Dr. Aubrey Zabow's opinion that he suffered from thought-disorder.

⁶⁹²² Chapter II D, Paragraph 18.

The Commission here does not write anything about Tsafendas's motive, although he must have been asked about it. After all, this was arguably the most crucial, question of all: why he killed Dr. Verwoerd. However, the Commission makes no reference to it. Although the Commission devotes an entire chapter to this question – Chapter III: Demitrio Tsafendas's Motives – even there, no clear motivation is elucidated.

Nevertheless, the Commission has mentioned here something very important, namely that Tsafendas did not show any remorse for killing Dr. Verwoerd. The conclusion must be that the Commission avoided asking the obvious question about motive or that it suppressed the answer because it contradicted the summary trial's conclusion, that Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd because of a tapeworm. After all, Tsafendas had already told the police his motive – that killing Dr. Verwoerd might lead to a change in the policy of apartheid. It is very possible that Tsafendas even repeated his statement, as he did often thirty years later, and the Commission killed it as it did with the statement to the police when dealing with the motive issue in the relevant chapter. Three decades later, Tsafendas still felt no remorse about the assassination. When asked by Fathers Ioannis Tsafaridis and Minas Constandinou if he ever regretted his action, he replied, "No, no, no, not even for a moment, never, never. I did the right thing. He was a dictator, he created apartheid..." Indeed, he said he would have regretted not doing it. He said he believed apartheid would soon collapse with Dr. Verwoerd out of the way and he did not expect it to last so long without him. Nevertheless, he maintained that he did not regret his action.⁶⁹²³

The fact that Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed at the Eleni three days before the assassination is not mentioned at all. As we will see later in this chapter, although the Commission has dedicated a substantial amount of space to the issue, it makes no reference at all to Tsafendas's version of how come the issue of Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed then. Did the Commission not ask Tsafendas if he had any idea how Dr. Verwoerd's death came to be discussed on board the tanker? After all, he was the man who laid the plans as to how and when he would kill Dr. Verwoerd. The Commission has speculated about the origins of the incident and after seeing the statements of some of those who were involved in the exchanges, it had the opportunity to ask the most important witness of all about the issue. However it seems that either Tsafendas was never questioned on the matter or his response was suppressed. It is possible that, if asked, Tsafendas would have volunteered a theory as to how Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed three days before he died, namely that his discussion of a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd which he had with some of the crew on board the Eleni was overheard by someone, misunderstood and passed on as a fact.

⁶⁹²³ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

Another issue that goes unmentioned is that of the references which helped Tsafendas get the job in Parliament. Tsafendas's access to Dr. Verwoerd was a huge security lapse and the Commission had gone to great lengths to find out what went wrong. Sydney Wiehand, one of the messengers who appointed Tsafendas, told the Commission that Tsafendas had supplied references but he could not recall the specifics. Did the Commission not press him as to who provided the references? The messenger referred to "a school." A little further investigation would surely have disclosed that one reference came from Limasollu Naci, the most prestigious private college in Istanbul, where Tsafendas taught English for six months. However, such a revelation would have been incompatible with the Court's portrayal of Tsafendas.

The Commission did, however, permit reference to one instance of political activity by Tsafendas. It stated that he denied "that he ever tried to canvass support in London for an uprising in South Africa. His efforts, he said, were confined to Portuguese territories." Of course, Tsafendas would not have admitted that he tried to rally support for South Africa as he was still hoping to be transferred to a hospital, thus he could not deviate from what was said about him in the court.

The Report concludes that Tsafendas's statement to the Commission was given to two doctors and both found signs of schizophrenia in the evidence. Since the statement is not in the author's possession, it cannot comment authoritatively about it. However, it is very possible that Tsafendas deliberately included some “delusional” thoughts in his evidence so as to maintain his act. Neither of Tsafendas’s statements to the police contain any sign of schizophrenia, as Professors Alban Burke and Tuviah Zabow confirmed.⁶⁹²⁴

Professor John Dugard said about the first and main statement that it “completely confirms the view that Tsafendas was not insane. It reads like a very normal story of a politically informed person, angry with apartheid and Dr. Verwoerd, determined to make a change, with nothing to lose personally. Really an incredible statement which was carefully concealed.”⁶⁹²⁵ Although the Report mentions nothing else of significance, it seems unlikely that this is all that was discussed with Tsafendas over a period of two hours.

TSAFENDAS’S SECOND APPEARANCE BEFORE THE COMMISSION

*On 11th November, 1966, the Commission interviewed Tsafendas again. His condition was appreciably better than on the previous occasion. He understood everything well, and gave his answers fairly promptly, which, with one or two exceptions, were logical and to the point.*⁶⁹²⁶

The Commission Report devotes only forty words to Tsafendas’s second appearance, the forty words set out above, which contain not a single reference to what Tsafendas said. His own account of his appearance has also gone missing, therefore the author is not in position to know what was discussed.

CONCLUSION

Although Tsafendas gave evidence twice to the Commission, the Report contains very little of what he said and this not in Tsafendas’s words but in those of the Commission. The most important issue, why he killed Dr. Verwoerd, remained unanswered. It seems highly unlikely that the Commission failed to ask Tsafendas why he killed Dr. Verwoerd, but still nothing is mentioned about it. Either the Commission did not ask the most important question of all, or it asked and did not like the answer and so made sure it did not see the light of day. The ⁶⁹²⁴ Professor Alban Burke in a personal interview, 12 April 2016; Professor Tuviah Zabow in a personal interview, 11 April 2016.

⁶⁹²⁵ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 7 February 2016.

⁶⁹²⁶ Chapter II D, Paragraph 19.

Commission does not mention the tapeworm, clearly distancing itself from it. However, if Tsafendas did mention it, the Commission would surely have included it in the Report in line with its generally negative approach to Tsafendas's character and actions.

The motive is not the only issue to go unexamined. The Dr. Verwoerd death discussion on the Eleni is ignored, as is the question of Tsafendas's job references. Any unbiased Commission of Inquiry would have attempted to find answers to these fundamental questions, especially since the person most likely to have the answers, Tsafendas himself, was available. The outstanding questions were:

- What was Tsafendas's motive? Why did he kill Dr. Verwoerd?
- What happened on the Eleni? How did it come about that Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed three days before he died?
- Which reference did Tsafendas use to get the job in the House of Assembly?

If Tsafendas was asked about these issues and gave an explanation suitable to the Commission, van Wyk would almost certainly have included his answers, as it did with the issues of his appointment to the Parliament and Vercueil. That there are no comments from Tsafendas suggests that he was either not asked, or that his answers were suppressed by the Commission. As we have seen, the Commission certainly suppressed the evidence Tsafendas gave to the police as well as important evidence given about him by witnesses, so it cannot be ruled out that Tsafendas's answers, too, were simply made to disappear.

THE ASSASSINATIONEXPERT STABBER

*The doctor who carried out the post-mortem examination informed the Commission that there were no grounds for the rumour that the wounds had been inflicted by an expert stabber. He described them as quite ordinary. The Commission had the opportunity of inspecting all the photographs showing the position and extent of the wounds and is in agreement with this opinion.*⁶⁹²⁷

Dr. E.L. Fisher, a psychiatrist and a United Party MP, the first doctor to treat Dr. Verwoerd after Tsafendas's attack in Parliament, told Die Vaderland the day after the assassination that "it was clear that the assassin must have received training in the art of handling knife. Each time the knife slipped through the ribs showing that it was not handled haphazardly as a usual stabbing would be carried out."⁶⁹²⁸ Furthermore, the Dagbreek, the newspaper on which Dr. Verwoerd was chairman, reported on September 11 that, "Medical doctors have also maintained that the way in which the stabbing was done attest to the attacker being an expert in using a dagger. The first thrust of the dagger was to the neck, in order to force the victim to raise his arms, and so open access to the heart. The second blow used the flat part of the dagger pushed between the ribs into the heart and twisted inside. The third and fourth blows were pushed into the lungs with the same precision."⁶⁹²⁹

The author agrees here with the post-mortem and the Commission. Firstly, Dr. Fisher was a psychiatrist, not an expert on knife wounds. It seems highly unlikely that he was able to determine the path of the knife and the damage it caused purely by observing the visible wounds. Secondly, Dr. Verwoerd's injuries could be seen for only a few minutes when his shirt was torn open and his torso partly bared before his body was removed. Further, most of the doctors' efforts during this period were aimed at reviving the Prime Minister by mouth-to-mouth and artificial respiration. As far as the author can establish, Dr. Fisher mentioned expertise in knifing handling only to Die Vaderland and not to any of the other newspapers he spoke to. As for the unnamed doctors who were quoted by Dagbreek, on which Dr. Verwoerd was chairman, it seems that they were able to form such an opinion by simply reading at the description of the stabbing and it seems highly unlikely to have been present.

⁶⁹²⁷ Chapter II D, Paragraph 12.

⁶⁹²⁸ Crowd and Revo, 1967: 20.

⁶⁹²⁹ Dagbreek, 11 September 1966, 'Tsafendas het vir V.V. in Persie gewerk.'

Even if they were present at the stabbing, they could not have been any of the doctors who treated Dr. Verwoerd as none of them made such statement apart from Dr. Fisher.

As for Tsafendas stabbing Dr. Verwoerd first in the neck, this was the natural thing to do. Dr. Verwoerd was seated at his desk and with his hands in front of him, a posture which made impossible for anyone to aim at the heart. Thus, for anyone approaching from the front, the neck was the most obvious and accessible target. A serious wound in the neck and throat area, however, could well prove fatal. Tsafendas's second target was the heart. Verwoerd by now had opened his arms, exposing a target area for Tsafendas. In terms purely of physical efficiency, Tsafendas's actions were normal.

Tsafendas could not be considered an "expert stabber," whatever that is, but he was certainly familiar with knives. His father would often hand-craft knives when he worked at Iscor Iron and Steel Works while one of Tsafendas's favourite possessions was a bayonet, which was given to him by his grandmother Katerina.⁶⁹³⁰ More importantly, all or most partisans of the DSE during the Greek Civil War possessed bayonets or at least knives. Tsafendas had received some basic training in guerrilla warfare from his comrades, so it is possible that he had learned how to use a bayonet or a knife, though he never said anything to that effect.

TSAFENDAS'S STATEMENT TO MAJOR ROSSOUW ON SEPTEMBER 11

The whole of Paragraph 15 in Chapter II D is taken from Tsafendas's statement to Major Rossouw on the 11th of September. It is used to describe how Tsafendas applied for the job in the House of Assembly and how he planned and carried out the assassination. The inclusion of his statement here shows that Tsafendas was perfectly able to describe the assassination and what happened before it. In court, Dr. Cooper, Dr. Sakinofsky and Dr. Zabow had testified that Tsafendas was unable to tell them what happened before and during the assassination.

⁶⁹³⁰ Mike Vlachopoulos in a personal interview, 14 April 2016.

TSAFENDAS ABOUT GETTING AWAY AFTER THE ASSASSINATION

*I deny that I am a Communist. I am a Christian and I believe in the Bible. I did not think I would get away after murdering the Prime Minister. I did not care what happened to me.*⁶⁹³¹

The issue of Tsafendas denying being a Communist has been discussed in the Investigation Chapter so it will not be considered again. As to his other comments, the Commission mentioned his statement that he “did not care what happened to me,” but omitted what came next, a declaration of his motive. Tsafendas made the comment in the statement used by the Commission. He told Major Rossouw on 11th September:

*“I did not care about the consequences for what would happen to me afterwards. I was so disgusted with the racial policy that I went through with my plans to kill the Prime Minister.”*⁶⁹³²

Then on 19th September, Tsafendas said to Major Rossouw:

*“I never thought about hiding if I had to do the job with a knife. I didn’t have much of a chance of getting away when using a knife. I didn’t care much and didn’t give it a second thought that I would be caught. I just happened to do it that way. I always had a grudge against the South African Government on account of its racial policies and I hated Dr. Verwoerd because he was a foreigner - a Hollander.”*⁶⁹³³

These statements reflect Tsafendas deep political convictions and determination, something that it is not evident in the Commission’s Report. By reducing his passionate explanation to the bald, eight-word phrase, “I did not care what happened to me,” the Commission manages to suggest the assassination was almost a whim by a man without a motive and unaware of the consequences.

TSAFENDAS’S ESCAPE PLAN?

Tsafendas did not have an escape plan for the assassination, but this was only because the weapon he decided to use would almost certainly make flight impossible. He had definitely planned to get away when he worked out his initial assassination strategy, to shoot Dr.

⁶⁹³¹ Chapter II D, Paragraph 15.

⁶⁹³² Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹³³ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

Verwoerd. He aborted this plan when he was not able to get a pistol and decided to use a knife instead. He told Major Rossouw regarding his escape plan:

TSAFENDAS: I was going to find refuge on the tanker, the Eleni, which I knew was sailing to South America. My plans were, however, upset when I could not get the right pistol. The boat sailed on the Saturday before the Tuesday on which I stabbed the Prime Minister.

MAJ. ROSSOUW: Did you know that the Eleni had sailed before you attacked, the Prime Minister? If so, what were your plans to get away?

TSAFENDAS: Yes, I knew the ship had already left. I never thought about hiding if I had to do the job with a knife. I didn't have much of a chance of getting away when using a knife. I didn't care much and didn't give it a second thought that I would be caught...⁶⁹³⁴

Tsafendas's initial plan to shoot Dr. Verwoerd and escape on the Eleni, was also mentioned at his summary trial.⁶⁹³⁵ His intention had been to shoot Dr. Verwoerd during a function at Parliament organized by the Parliamentary correspondents.⁶⁹³⁶ He was listed to work as a waiter at the event, which Dr. Verwoerd was scheduled to attend. The function was set for Friday, September 2, the evening before the Eleni's scheduled departure. In the event, Dr. Verwoerd did not attend the party,⁶⁹³⁷ but Tsafendas had already aborted his plan because of his inability to find a pistol.⁶⁹³⁸ This issue is also discussed under 'Escape Plan' in "The Eleni" section.

⁶⁹³⁴ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹³⁵ Dr. Harold Cooper's testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 17 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁹³⁶ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶⁹³⁷ Fred Peinauer statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹³⁸ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

TSAFENDAS'S RECLASSIFICATION

*On 30th August, 1965, he applied as Demetrio Tsafendas to the Regional Representative of the Department of the Interior to be reclassified as a Coloured person. He gave the reason that he regarded himself as a Coloured and that he wished to marry a Coloured. On 1st September, 1965, he made a sworn statement in support of his application.*⁶⁹³⁹

The above statement, although almost certainly correct, is a direct contradiction of a memorandum written on 3rd of October by Attorney-General van den Berg, who led the case for the State at Tsafendas's summary trial. The following is an extract from it:

*"According to a statement in my possession, there was never any question of a marriage between him and the Coloured woman, Helen Daniels, from Belleville South. Information from Home Affairs files indicates that he applied for reclassification as a Coloured because he wanted to apply for a business licence in a Coloured area."*⁶⁹⁴⁰

The Home Affairs files which van den Berg referred to were not found in the archives nor was anything discovered relating to Tsafendas's application regarding his reclassification. The only information about this matter comes from witnesses' statements, including that of Tsafendas. All agree with the Commission and disagree with the Attorney-General. What is important here, however, is not the reclassification or Tsafendas's motive behind it, but that the Attorney-General was not in possession of all the evidence gathered by the South African police. It is obvious that the Attorney-General and the Commission gave contradictory statements on the same issue and the most likely reason for this was that not all the evidence gathered by the police was given to them.

In addition: After the assassination there were rumours that Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd because he was barred from marrying a Coloured girl because of the Immorality Act. Years later, Father Minas Constandinou asked Tsafendas if these rumours were true. Tsafendas smiled and dismissed the stories. He said that if he wanted to marry a Coloured girl he could have taken her to Mozambique where it was legal to marry her, or to Cuba, where he was planning to move and live the rest of his life.⁶⁹⁴¹

⁶⁹³⁹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 39.

⁶⁹⁴⁰ Detailed information for a Memorandum regarding Demetrio Tsafendas by Attorney-General W.M. van den Berg, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, Subject: Beweerde Omkoperij. NASA.

⁶⁹⁴¹ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

TSAFENDAS'S SUMMARY TRIAL (Chapter II D, Paragraph 17)

The Commission dedicates a paragraph to the summary trial, but gets an important fact wrong. It states that Patrick O’Ryan and his wife, among others, testified to Tsafendas’s “peculiar behaviour.” In fact, O’Ryan, when asked about Tsafendas, told the court that he “never got the impression that something was wrong in his mind,” or that he was “mentally disturbed.”⁶⁹⁴²

The Commission then refers to four psychiatrists who examined Tsafendas and testified at the trial: Dr. Cooper, Dr. Zabow, Prof. van Wyk and Dr. Macgregor. Surprisingly, Dr. Sakinofsky is omitted. The Report then states that Dr. Muller, a specialist physician, also examined Tsafendas and found that he had no tapeworm. However, Dr. Muller only spoke to Tsafendas, he did not physically examine him.

⁶⁹⁴² Patrick O’ Ryan testimony on Tsafendas’s summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

TSAFENDAS'S MOTHER

*According to information supplied to the South African Consul-General in Lourenço Marques, his mother is still alive and is living in the Bantu quarter of Lourenço Marques.*⁶⁹⁴³

No such evidence was found in the archives. However, the Portuguese press and later the South African reported this claim about Tsafendas's mother as a fact.⁶⁹⁴⁴ Tsafendas always maintained, as is also stated in the Report, that his mother died when he was a boy. That is what he was told by his father and by members of his mother's tribe,⁶⁹⁴⁵ while he had also obtained her death certificate which stated that she had died on January 12, 1927.⁶⁹⁴⁶ The author has not been able to resolve this contradiction or to discover anything further about Tsafendas's mother, but it seems rather unlikely that someone in the Registrar of Births and Deaths in Lourenço Marques would have produced a fake death certificate and that all these people lied.

⁶⁹⁴³ Chapter II A, Paragraph 6.

⁶⁹⁴⁴ Dagbreek, 11 September 1966, 'Kleurlingmoeder in haglike omstandighede.'; Diario de Lisboa, 8 September 1966, 'A mae de Dimitrio ainda vive nos arredores de Lourenço Marques'; Rand Daily Mail, 9 September 1966, 'Tsafendas' Mother still alive'; Diario de Lisboa, 13 September 1966, 'Localizada a Mae de Tsafendas.'

⁶⁹⁴⁵ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁴⁶ The history of the person who inflicted the fatal wounds to the late Dr. Verwoerd drafted by Col. McIntyre, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Subject: Leer W.D. 10/10/4102 der Stafendas. NASA

TSAFENDAS'S NAME

Both Tsafendas's name and surname underwent changes from time to time in the course of his life, besides which he was known to some people by the nicknames of MIMIS and MIEMIE. The other first names and surnames which he used from time to time are as follows:

First names: DEMETRIO, DIMITRIO, DIMITRO, DEMETRIOS, DEMITRIUS and JAMES.

Surnames: TSAFANDAKIS, TSAFENDAKIS, TSAFANTAKIS, TSAFENDOS, TSAFENDIS, TSAFANTAKIS and WILLIAMS.⁶⁹⁴⁷

Although Tsafendas's father, Michalis, used the surname Tsafantakis, the family's original name was Tsafendas and Dimitri was aware of this from a very young age. A change in nomenclature had occurred more than a hundred years earlier when Crete was under Ottoman occupation.⁶⁹⁴⁸ The rebellious activities by the Cretans were causing the empire much trouble, so the Ottoman overlords ordered that "akis," a suffix indicating smallness, as in a child, should be added to every Cretan name. It is customary in Greece for a boy named Nicholas to become Nicholakis to his family and friends; Georgios would be Georgakis and Dimitri-Dimitrakis. However, the Ottomans' intention was to humiliate and mock the rebellious Cretans by suggesting they were little people of no account. The Cretans were furious and opposed the change, but the rule of the occupiers prevailed.⁶⁹⁴⁹

Hearing this story, Dimitri asked his father to change the family name back to Tsafendas. Michalis sympathised but said that would be difficult since everyone knew him as Tsafantakis and that was how his name appeared in official documents.⁶⁹⁵⁰ A few years later, however, Dimitri went ahead and changed his own surname to Tsafendas. The date of the change is uncertain. In all available official documents up to the 1950s, he appears as Tsafantakis.

Finally, Tsafendas often deliberately registered himself with a slightly different name so that his past would not be traced, using such spellings as Stafendas, Tsascadeskis, Tsafedis etc. This was not difficult as he was in possession of a birth certificate written in Greek. Whenever he produced it to someone, he would just replace one or few letters from the certificate but would still make it look like his proper name. For example, the name was

⁶⁹⁴⁷ Chapter II A, Paragraph 4

⁶⁹⁴⁸ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁴⁹ Apostolakis, 2009.

⁶⁹⁵⁰ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

written as “Τσαφαντακης,” so he would keep the Greek letters that are similar to English letter like T, a, t, k but substitute some of the others with false letters, for example, Tcamafakus etc.⁶⁹⁵¹ Tsafendas sometimes gave James as his Christian name. This is an anglicised form of Dimitri often used by Greek people outside of their home country. Dimitri can also become Jimmy or Jim. An Italian friend of Tsafendas in Beira always called him Jimmy.⁶⁹⁵²

⁶⁹⁵¹ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁶⁹⁵² Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015.

TSAFENDAS SEXUALLY ASSAULTED

*Tsafendas alleges that in 1927 he was violated by a member of his family. He says that he did not tell anyone of this, and it is not possible, therefore, to check this allegation.*⁶⁹⁵³

Despite exhaustive research, the author has not been able to establish whether or not such an incident took place. In 1946, in Grafton State Hospital, Tsafendas spoke about his sexual life and past sexual “traumas,” all of which he invented, but he did not mention being raped or assaulted. Tsafendas brought the rape story up with Dr. Cooper when the psychiatrist examined him for the defence at the summary trial, but he also spoke of it to the police in his statement of September 12, 1966, claiming that his step-mother persuaded her brother to rape him when he was a boy in Lourenço Marques. It is not possible to know what, if anything, occurred on this occasion. What is almost impossible to believe is that his step-mother asked her brother to violate her stepson and that Tsafendas really believed such a thing happened. He did speak negatively about his relationship with his step-mother to various psychiatrists, but never to anyone else. On the contrary, he often described how loving she was and how she treated him as her own child. What is more, Tsafendas never spoke about the alleged rape to anyone else, though the embarrassment attaching to such a story might have been a restraining factor.

A key to the conundrum might lie in a statement Tsafendas made in later in life, that two claims were necessary to make an “insane act” look real and convince someone you are mad:

- a. To have a family history of insanity and
- b. To have a childhood trauma.⁶⁹⁵⁴

This could explain why Tsafendas said negative things about his step-mother to the psychiatrists, but not to the police, since at the time, he was not trying to prove he was insane. It is very possible that Tsafendas spoke of the alleged rape to the police because he knew he might need to pretend madness to avoid torture or worse as a consequence of killing Dr. Verwoerd. If a mad act became necessary, having a childhood trauma in his past would add authenticity.

⁶⁹⁵³ Chapter II A, Paragraph 9.

⁶⁹⁵⁴ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

TSAFENDAS IN ISTANBUL

*The next country he visited was Turkey. It appears that he was there during the second half of 1961 and the beginning of 1962. He was employed for two months as a teacher of English.*⁶⁹⁵⁵

The Commission statement that Tsafendas was employed as a teacher of English in Turkey was well known, having been reported by South African newspapers within two days of the assassination.⁶⁹⁵⁶ The Commission merely touches on the fact, gives no details, fails to mention the name of the school, although it was aware of it, and shortens the length of Tsafendas's stay. Tsafendas did not work for two months, but for about five-six months. The Commission wishes to sidestep the question that would have been raised if it was known that Tsafendas worked for five-six months as a teacher at the best private language college in Turkey, namely, how could a schizophrenic unable to follow a conversation for more than fifteen minutes, with thought-disorder and a disjointed way of speaking manage to secure a job of this sort and keep it for so long? This is a very important part of the Report and it is examined in the section 'The Limasollu Naci' of this chapter in the 'Employment' section.

⁶⁹⁵⁵ Chapter II B, Paragraph 37.

⁶⁹⁵⁶ The Cape Times, 8 September 1966, 'Tsafendas taught Turks English'; Daily Dispatch, 8 September 1966: 1, 'Tsafendas taught English in Turkey'; The Daily News, 8 September 1966: 17, 'Tsafendas seen as 'mystery man.'"

TSAFENDAS IN RUSSIA?

If Tsafendas ever visited Russia, it must have been during the years 1961 or 1962. As will appear from this report, there are witnesses who allege that he intimated on certain occasions that he had in fact been to Russia and that he could speak Russian. Tsafendas denies that he has any knowledge of this language, or that he has ever visited Russia. The evidence in this connection is not strong, and it is not possible to base any definite finding on it.⁶⁹⁵⁷

The author has not been able to establish whether Tsafendas ever visited Russia since the evidence is contradictory and not conclusive for either option. However, it seems more likely that he did not go there. However, if he did visit Russia, it could certainly not have been in 1961 and was highly unlikely to have been in 1962.

Tsafendas often sent postcards from abroad and sometimes photographs of himself in a foreign town or city. His half-sister, Katerina Pnema, told the author that she thinks she received letter from Tsafendas from Russia, but she is not 100 per cent sure. She is quite certain, however, that it came from the Eastern Bloc and could have been from Bulgaria. It was certainly letter and not photograph or postcard, she said, as she would have remembered it. She also does not recall Tsafendas ever telling her that he visited Russia.⁶⁹⁵⁸

Tsafendas's other half-sister, Eleni Vlachopoulos, stated in Live and Let Live that Tsafendas had visited Russia, but she did not say how she knew this.⁶⁹⁵⁹ Pnema suggested that it may have been because of correspondence she received or from talks they had afterwards among the family. She said it also possible that her sister confused Russia with Bulgaria. Furthermore, Tsafendas once sent his father a gift of a miniature Katyusha rocket, the weapon used widely by the Soviets during the Second World War. However, this was certainly in the 1950s when his father was still living with Tsafendas's step-mother and before they separated.⁶⁹⁶⁰ It is also obvious that Tsafendas could have acquired the toy rocket anywhere in Europe. Finally, Gordon Winter claimed that General van den Bergh had evidence that Tsafendas visited Russia, but he withheld this information from the ⁶⁹⁵⁷ Chapter II B, Paragraph 38.

⁶⁹⁵⁸ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁶⁹⁵⁹ Eleni Vlachopoulos in Manolis Dimelas's Live and Let Live, 2007.

⁶⁹⁶⁰ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

Commission and from his report on Tsafendas.⁶⁹⁶¹ However, he did not specify what his evidence was.

Tsafendas always talked about the countries he visited and none of the sixty-nine witnesses interviewed by the author recalled him saying he had been to Russia. Such was his talkative character, they said that if he had been, he would at least have told the people close to him. However, some of these witnesses did not rule out that Tsafendas might have told them and they forgot. Tsafendas spoke at length over a period of more than ten years to the priests who visited him in prison and in hospital. He told them about his life from the day he was born, including several confidential information such as the truth about the tapeworm. However, none of the priests remembers Tsafendas telling them he had been to Russia.⁶⁹⁶² It seems unlikely that Tsafendas would talk in detail about his life and journeying and omit Russia. His close first cousin, Mary Eendracht, who got numerous letters and postcards from him is certain that she never received any from Russia and that he never told her he had been there.⁶⁹⁶³

As far as the author can establish for certain, the only country in the then Communist Eastern Bloc which Tsafendas visited was Bulgaria. The probability is that he was never in Russia, but if he was, it was certainly not in 1961 and was probably not in 1962, when his movements are fully accounted for. He was in Jerusalem on January 20, 1961⁶⁹⁶⁴ and spent the next five months in the area before travelling through Lebanon and Syria by bus; he crossed the Taurus mountain range and reached Ankara in May 1961 and stayed there for a month.⁶⁹⁶⁵

Around June 1961, Tsafendas arrived in Istanbul and remained there until December 1961. He then went to Bulgaria and spent Christmas and New Year's Eve in Greece. In January 1962 he visited Crete and at the end of the same month arrived in Brindisi, southern ⁶⁹⁶¹ Gordon Winter's correspondence with David Beresford, 8 September 1998. Liza Key's personal collection.

⁶⁹⁶² Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Michalis Visvinis in a personal interview, 11 July 2015.

⁶⁹⁶³ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014.

⁶⁹⁶⁴ Report of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, proc. 518/15/55. Co. 334. 6 April 1961. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁹⁶⁵ Confidential Report of the Ministerio Dos Negocios Estrangeiros regarding Dimtri Tsafendas, proc. 518/15/55. Co. 367. 20 October 1961. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

Italy.⁶⁹⁶⁶ He arrived in Rome on February 8, 1962⁶⁹⁶⁷ and by the end of the month he was in Lisbon, having travelled by train.⁶⁹⁶⁸ Sometime in June or July 1962, Tsafendas was in London. It is unknown how long he stayed in Britain but he was certainly back in Lisbon in October 1962.⁶⁹⁶⁹ He then remained in Portugal until October 1963 when he returned to Mozambique.⁶⁹⁷⁰

All of this makes it extremely difficult for Tsafendas to have gone to Russia during the two years mentioned by the Commission, 1961 and 1962. The only possible window was between February 1962 and October 1963, when he was in Portugal. However, Tsafendas spent the first few months in Lisbon in the Albergue da Mitra (Hostel Mitra) before visiting London in June or July 1962. He was back in Lisbon probably in July or in August, and on October 27, 1962, he visited a police station in Lisbon in an attempt to have his exile from Mozambique ended.⁶⁹⁷¹ He did not succeed and in November, 1962, he made yet another application for entry to South Africa, which he submitted to that country's embassy in Lisbon.⁶⁹⁷² Therefore the only possible time that Tsafendas could have visited the Soviet Union in 1962 is between September-October. However, Tsafendas was informed about his adored father's death sometime in August or September 1962 and became desperate to get back to South Africa to visit his grave. Thus, it seems rather unlikely that he would travel to Russia when he was trying desperately to get back to South Africa.

In addition, PIDE, who kept a close eye on Tsafendas while he was in Portugal and was aware of his travels as he was using a Portuguese passport, makes no mention of any such travel to the Soviet Union. In those years, the Iron Curtain was impenetrable. Tsafendas could not just slip over the border as he did in South Africa, thus he would have needed a visa. These were extremely difficult to get and if issued, usually took a long time. Tsafendas never told any of the witnesses he met in 1963 and were interviewed by the author that he had visited Russia the year before, while he did however state openly that he had been to ⁶⁹⁶⁶ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹⁶⁷ Seccao Consular Report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas, 10 February 1962. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁹⁶⁸ Confidential PIDE report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas, No: 3.699-G.U, 13 November 1962. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁹⁶⁹ Eleni Vlachopoulos in Manolis Dimelas's Live and Let Live, 2007.

⁶⁹⁷⁰ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹⁷¹ Letter of a police agent to the Ministry of Interiors regarding Tsafendas's exile. 30 October 1962. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁶⁹⁷² Report of the COE. Chapter II B, Paragraph 40. December 1966. R.P. 16/1967. Pretoria.

Bulgaria. If he was happy to mention Communist Bulgaria, he would presumably have felt no constraint about speaking of the Soviet Union. Tsafendas invariably travelled by train or by boat as he was afraid of flying, and anyway he could not afford plane tickets. This suggests that if he travelled to the Soviet Union it would probably have been by train, an extremely long voyage and one he was most unlikely to have undertaken in 1962 due to lack of time.

That Tsafendas visited Russia cannot be ruled out, but if he did so, this may have happened sometime between 1954 and 1959 when he was travelling in West Germany, Sweden and Denmark, countries which were physically closer to the Soviet Union. That, however, is supposition and there is not any evidence that Tsafendas entered Russia during this period.

As for Tsafendas being able to speak Russian, this depends on one's definition of speaking a language. According to his half-sister, Katerina Pnema, Tsafendas picked up some Russian from Soviet sailors in Lourenço Marques in the 1930s and by reading a Russian dictionary. As far as the author can establish, he knew enough words and phrases to enable him to communicate on a basic level with the occasional Russian he came across, but he could not hold a fluent conversation in the language. Finally, although Tsafendas was an accomplished linguist, he never listed Russian as one of his languages.

TSAFENDAS'S TEETH

On 9th October 1964, he re-entered Rhodesia at Umtali. In Umtali he tried to buy a farm, but since it appeared that he had no money, no transaction took place. He also said that the silver fillings in his teeth had been done in Russia (To the Commission he stated that he had obtained these in Turkey).⁶⁹⁷³

The statement regarding Tsafendas's teeth is inaccurate. Several witnesses said Tsafendas told them that the dental work had been done in Bulgaria.⁶⁹⁷⁴ None of the witnesses interviewed by the author stated that the teeth were made in Russia or in Turkey. Most of them did not know which country was involved, but those who mentioned a country, mentioned Bulgaria. Father Nikola Banovic also stated that when Tsafendas left Turkey for Bulgaria he did not have new silver-type teeth. What is more, Tsafendas went to Sofia, Bulgaria, to visit his DSE comrade from the Greek Civil War who happened to be a dentist. All these strands of information strongly suggest that Tsafendas had his teeth fixed in Bulgaria, very likely by his dentist comrade. Since Tsafendas did not have the silver teeth while in Turkey up to December 1961, obviously he had them made sometime afterwards. It is highly unlikely that Tsafendas visited Russia between December 1961 and October 1963 when he returned to Mozambique as his movements throughout this period are accountable through PIDEs reports. This again, makes Bulgaria and very likely his dentist comrade as the most likely answers.

However, the Commission's reference to Russia is not unjustified, since two people had mentioned Russia in this context. Spiros Raftopoulos, whose shop in Umtali was twice visited by Tsafendas, said in a statement to the police that "Tsafendas told him that he had them done while he was staying in Russia."⁶⁹⁷⁵ And The Umtali Post reported on September 9, that Tsafendas visited a café in Umtali in about October 1964. The lady owner was curious about his teeth and she quoted Tsafendas as saying they were false teeth which were made for him when he visited Russia.⁶⁹⁷⁶

⁶⁹⁷³ Chapter II C, Paragraph 18.

⁶⁹⁷⁴ For example, Andreas Babioulakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Alexander Moumbaris in a personal interview, 13 December 2015; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 29 March 2015 and several others.

⁶⁹⁷⁵ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁶⁹⁷⁶ The Umtali Post, 9 September 1966: 1, 'Assassin was seen in Umtali.'

It is highly unlikely that Tsafendas would lie or be confused as to where his teeth were fixed. The probability is that both Raftopoulos and the café lady confused Bulgaria with Russia. Andreas Babiolakis said that for most people in Africa, especially old people, “Bulgaria and Russia were like the same, as it was for every country in the Eastern Bloc. If you were saying Bulgaria it was like saying Russia!”⁶⁹⁷⁷ As for why Tsafendas told the Commission that he had the teeth done in Turkey, a plausible theory is that he did not want to reveal that he had been in the Eastern Bloc nor expose his connection with his dentist comrade.

⁶⁹⁷⁷ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016.

TSAFENDAS'S CAPE ARGUS INTERVIEW

In July 1966, Tsafendas had a long interview with Mr. Hartford of the Cape Argus. They had already met at the beginning of the year when Tsafendas came to enquire whether there was any news of the so-called freedom fighters of Mozambique. He described himself as a rebel from Mozambique. Mr. Hartford thought that he might be able to provide material for a magazine article and asked him to return later for an interview. This interview was postponed a few times until it took place sometime in July. It lasted about 75 minutes. Tsafendas recounted inter alia, how he had entered the Union illegally in 1936. He made no secret of his strong anti-Portuguese feelings, but did not utter a word against the South African Government. He complained, inter alia, that he still suffered from headaches as a result of the treatment he had been given by the Portuguese in Lisbon after the war. Mr. Hartford's impression was that Tsafendas was normal; he had no reason to believe that he was mentally defective. This witness had listened to the evidence in the Supreme Court on Tsafendas's condition after the death of Dr. Verwoerd, and his impression was that his condition must have deteriorated since the interview for, when he interviewed Tsafendas, the latter spoke fluently without any noticeable gaps in the conversation. He added, however, that after he had heard the evidence, it occurred to him that Tsafendas had in fact sometimes evaded his questions, but not to such an extent as to arouse his suspicions about his mental condition.⁶⁹⁷⁸

Hartford's statement to the Commission was not discovered in the archives, but his name was found among those listed to give evidence on the 4th of November. Hartford spent seventy-five minutes with Tsafendas for his interview and got the impression that Tsafendas was "normal; he had no reason to believe that he was mentally defective... he spoke fluently without any noticeable gaps in the conversation." This contradicts Dr. Cooper's evidence that Tsafendas was unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes and that he spoke in a disjointed manner.

The Commission states that Hartford, after hearing what was said at the summary trial about Tsafendas, formed the impression that "his condition must have deteriorated since the interview." He also concluded that Tsafendas had evaded questions during the interview. The Commission does not seem to have pursued the suspected evasions, perhaps because it was obvious that Tsafendas would choose what to answer when discussing such sensitive political matters as Portuguese rebels and Mozambique's independence, with their security implications. The author cannot know exactly what questions were raised in the interview, but certainly Tsafendas would not have been able to give answers to many and naturally evaded them. Suppose he had been asked on what grounds he received amnesty and was allowed back to Mozambique after twelve years in exile? He could hardly have replied, "I pretended to be mad!" Then, if Hartford asked how he avoided service in the Portuguese military, could he possibly have given the same answer?

⁶⁹⁷⁸ Chapter II C, Paragraph 75.

TSAFENDAS AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

*Tsafendas often attended services of his church at private homes in Durban. Some of the members of the same faith testified that he saw himself as an outcast, that he was always pitying himself, but that he never showed any gratitude for anything that was done for him.*⁶⁹⁷⁹

*At church services, particularly, no one could understand what he was saying.*⁶⁹⁸⁰

The Report refers to “some” church members criticising Tsafendas, but only one such statement was found in the Commission’s archives. This does not mean it was the only one, since other similar statements might have gone missing. However, this statement, by Caroline Barbeau, contained all the references quoted by the Report. She said of Tsafendas that “he liked to pity himself saying that his family did not want him, but at the same time he never thanked one for any kindness shown him.”⁶⁹⁸¹ It seems evident that in referring to “some members,” the Commission was actually referring only to Caroline Barbeau. Her testimony has been examined in the Investigation Chapter.

Barbeau’s was the only statement from the two hundred people who were interviewed by the police and the Commission and whose statements were found in the archives which described Tsafendas in negative terms. It seems extraordinary that none of the other two hundred expressed similar views if Tsafendas behaved as Barbeau claimed. None of the forty-four witnesses who were interviewed by the author agreed with Barbeau’s characterisation of Tsafendas; in fact, all denied that Tsafendas was as she portrayed. It is noteworthy that the Christian Church, of which Barbeau was a member, sought to distance itself from Tsafendas and discount its links with him after the assassination.⁶⁹⁸² Many of the Church’s members were questioned by the police⁶⁹⁸³ and the negative attention this brought them, along with the fact that Tsafendas was a member of the sect, made them feel deeply embarrassed. They felt it reflected badly on their Church and like the Greek Community in ⁶⁹⁷⁹ Chopater II C, Paragraph 35.

⁶⁹⁸⁰ Chpater II C, Paragraph 38.

⁶⁹⁸¹ Caroline Barbeau statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁶⁹⁸² Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Richard Poggenpoel in a personal interview, 30 July 2013; Reuben O’ Ryan in a personal interview, 15 April 2016; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶⁹⁸³ The Observer, 18 September 1966: 2, ‘Police question S. African sect.’; Sunday Times, 18 September 1966: 18: 5, ‘Tsafendas’s brothers are quizzed.’

South Africa, tried to distance themselves and the Church from Tsafendas.⁶⁹⁸⁴

Merle Daniels, also a member of the Church, admitted during Tsafendas's summary trial that she "would like to protect the name of the Christian Church."⁶⁹⁸⁵ When Peter and Helen Daniels (the woman who asked Tsafendas to marry her), were interviewed by Post journalist Gordon Winter, they asked him not to mention that Helen was a preacher for the Christian Church because it "would bring disgrace" on the Church.⁶⁹⁸⁶ Like most local Greeks, some members of the sect sought to disown Tsafendas in order to protect their reputation. It is more than coincidence that Barbeau and James Johnston, both members of the Church, were the two of the three witnesses of the two hundred questioned by the police and the Commission to speak negatively about Tsafendas.

At least some of the Church's members, before the assassination, had a very high opinion of Tsafendas. Patrick O'Ryan said that Tsafendas was described to him by a fellow member of the Church as a "highly cultured gentleman, a very refined gentleman who speaks seven languages."⁶⁹⁸⁷ Others spoke well of Tsafendas to Helen Daniels and recommended him as her husband. This was significant because Helen, as a preacher, was highly respected by the Church. Her co-religionists would have never recommended someone who was as described by Barbeau.

The second derogatory reference by the Commission - that no-one could understand Tsafendas at church services - was probably taken from Helen Daniels's testimony which sought to show Tsafendas as an outsider. It is likely that what the church people could not understand was Tsafendas's viewpoint concerning the role of the Church in modern society. Tsafendas had clashed with the Church leaders because they advocated "the Biblical idea of subservience to a Government," including to the governing National Party and its policy of apartheid, a stance which he hotly disputed.⁶⁹⁸⁸ The only member of the Christian Church to reveal this to the police was Patrick O'Ryan.⁶⁹⁸⁹

⁶⁹⁸⁴ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Richard Poggenpoel in a personal interview, 30 July 2013; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁶⁹⁸⁵ Marle Daniels testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁹⁸⁶ Gordon Winter in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes; Gordon Winter in a personal interview with Dr. James Sanders on behalf of the author, 19 August 2016.

⁶⁹⁸⁷ Patrick O' Ryan in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997. This part is available in the rushes.

⁶⁹⁸⁸ Richard Poggenpoel in a personal interview, 30 July 2013; Patrick O' Ryan testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

⁶⁹⁸⁹ Patrick O' Ryan testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA.

CHAPTER III: DEMITRIO TSAFENDAS'S MOTIVES

Chapter III of the Commission's Report deals exclusively with Tsafendas's alleged motives.

The following is the whole chapter:

1. In determining Tsafendas's motives, we must bear in mind that we are not dealing with a normal person.

2. The finding that he was mentally disordered at the time of the examination by the Supreme Court, Cape Town, in October 1966, is accepted without any reservation.

It is probable that at all material times he was not mentally normal, but there may be some difference of opinion as to the degree of disorder.

3. His unhappy childhood, his discovery that he was an illegitimate child and that he was not White, the fact that his family did not really accept him, as well as that to all intents and purposes he knew no fatherland, that practically no country would have him, and all the other knocks and blows referred to in his history, undoubtedly inflicted severe psychological damage.

4. Whatever the causes were, there can be no doubt that he was a maladjusted, rejected, frustrated, feckless rolling-stone. He is boastful, selfish, unscrupulous and crafty.

5. Although there were exceptions, he almost invariably displayed strong feelings against the present South African; Government. During the Second World War, he was a member of the Communist Party in South Africa; in England, he made contact with extreme leftists, and even tried to find support for an uprising against the present Government in South Africa. It is probable that while he was working in the House of Assembly his interest in politics and his condemnation of the present Government became more intense.

The discontent of the crew of the Eleni about the Immorality Act probably had a profound effect on his already receptive mind.

6. It may be that the idea of murdering Dr. Verwoerd had already occurred to him when he realized that he might secure a post in the House of Assembly, but it is probable that the idea obtruded itself more strongly in his mind only when he started working in the House of Assembly and realized that it was within his power to, commit such a deed. It is unlikely that it already existed when he had the interview with Hartford in July 1966, for, if he had had such intentions then, he would not have divulged the facts about himself, including the fact that he was a rebel from Mozambique.

7. In the clouded mind of this outcast, who was a complete failure, whose life meant practically nothing to him, was born a cunning plan to make use of his power to destroy the head of a Government which he hated.

8. When he bought the pistol on the Eleni, the plan to kill Dr. Verwoerd must already have existed.

His explanation to the Commission that he had bought the pistol and knives for self-defence is unacceptable.

His statement to the Commission that the assault was not planned, but that he had experienced a sudden impulse immediately before the assault was made, does not tally with the facts.

9. Even if he was mentally disordered on 6th September, 1966, it is clear that when he bought the knives that morning he knew what he was doing, and knew what he was planning to do.

He concealed the knives carefully and had enough self-control to wait his chance. Unaided, without a false move, with cunning timing and with unerring purpose he executed his plan.

ANALYSIS OF THE CHAPTER

Chapter III of the Report purports to explain why Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd and is thus of critical importance to the Commission's designated task, as outlined in its terms of reference, namely "to enquire into and submit a report on all aspects relating to the death of the late Dr. the Honourable Hendrik Frensch Verwoerd which the said commission deems to be in the public interest." Yet what is arguably the most significant of these aspects, Tsafendas's motivation, is dealt with in one of the Report's shortest chapters, a mere nine paragraphs, most of which are devoted to a negative and largely inaccurate portrayal of Tsafendas's character. Only two obscurely worded paragraphs, both of them suppositional, address the question of motivation. Anyone reading this chapter might conclude that Tsafendas had no real motive for his action, since only hatred for the Government is mentioned, along with some vague speculation as to what might have triggered his hand. The greater part of the chapter is used to denigrate Tsafendas with a series of negative and unfounded characterisations, as well as to note the "severe psychological damage" it alleged he had suffered.

The Report sounds convincing in presenting Tsafendas as someone without a clear motive. Ellison Kahn, Professor of Law at the University of the Witwatersrand, wrote in 1968, just two years after the Report's publication, that "the van Wyk Commission had searched in vain for an indisputable motive."⁶⁹⁹⁰ Professor Kahn's observation seems correct based on the contents of the Report, as this is the impression that the Commission wanted to give. However, in reality it is wrong, as Tsafendas had given perfectly clear and logical political reasons for the killing; the Commission, although very well aware of this, simply omitted them. Therefore, it was natural that someone, just like Professor Kahn, who was not aware of Tsafendas's statements, would have been given the wrong impression by the Report.

Paragraph 5 of the Commission's Report says:

"[Tsafendas] almost invariably displayed strong feelings against the present South African Government... it is probable that while he was working in the House of Assembly his interest in politics and his condemnation of the present Government became more intense. The discontent of the crew of the Eleni about the Immorality Act probably had a profound effect on his already receptive mind."

⁶⁹⁹⁰ Kahn, 1968: 163.

Paragraph 7 says:

“In the clouded mind of this outcast, who was a complete failure, whose life meant practically nothing to him, was born a cunning plan to make use of his power to destroy the head of a Government which he hated.”

The tentative nature of the Commission's conclusions is reflected in the use of the words “probable” and “probably” in the first quoted paragraph, and in the entirely subjective nature of the second, which claims to read Tsafendas's mind as to his intentions and their causes.

What cannot be ignored is that Tsafendas had made it perfectly clear why he killed Dr. Verwoerd in statements he gave to the police and that these statements were in the possession of the Commission. He told the police that he killed the Prime Minister because he was “disgusted with his racial policies” and hoped that by killing him “a change of policy would take place.”⁶⁹⁹¹ There could hardly be a clearer exposition of the fundamental political reason – to secure a change of policy – which prompted him to act as he did. Committing an act which aims for political change is the perfect definition of a political act. In addition, in his first statement to the police, Tsafendas declared that he “wanted to see a government representing all the South African people.” He said, “I do not think the Nationalist Government is representative of the people and I wanted to see a different government.”⁶⁹⁹² In his second statement, he testified that “I always had a grudge against the South African government on account of its racial policies and I hated Dr. Verwoerd because he was a foreigner – a Hollander.”⁶⁹⁹³ His reference to Dr. Verwoerd being a foreigner has already been discussed and was one of the many misrepresentations at the summary trial.

The Commission's cherry-picking approach to written and oral evidence to suit its purposes goes beyond turning a blind eye to the above-mentioned aspects of Tsafendas's statements. In the Report's Chapter II D, Paragraph 15, the Commission has no hesitation in making extensive use of Tsafendas's account from his statement to the police of his movements prior to the killing and of the killing itself. However, the Commission does not use Tsafendas's own words from the same account to explain his motive. Is there a better way of explaining a person's motive than by using his own words and his own explanation? That the Commission did not do this is clearly because Tsafendas's words did not sound like the words of a madman. More importantly, they flatly contradicted what was heard in the court about his motive and they did not fit with the picture of him that emerged from the summary trial.

⁶⁹⁹¹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. COE, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹⁹² Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. COE, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹⁹³ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. COE, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

Furthermore, no mention is made of more significant statements where at least five witnesses, Cleanthes Alachiotis, Nikolaos Billis, Nikolas Kambouris, Georgios Kantas and Michalis Vasilakis, testified to the South African police that Tsafendas had characterised any assassination of Dr. Verwoerd as justifiable because he was a tyrant and a dictator; and this was just three days before the assassination.⁶⁹⁹⁴ Another witness, Edward Furness, told the police that Tsafendas was willing to do "anything that would get the South African regime out of power."⁶⁹⁹⁵ Neither of these statements was referred to in the Commission's Report.

Although Tsafendas appeared twice before the Commission, no mention is made of the most obvious question of all: Why did he kill Dr. Verwoerd? He must surely have been asked by the Commission, and if he was (it is impossible to know for certain because accounts of his testimony have disappeared), his reply is not recorded. Therefore, what did Tsafendas say when called twice before the Commission?

Significantly, the Report makes no reference to the tapeworm, which was adduced at the summary trial as the reason Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd. Had Tsafendas mentioned the tapeworm in his evidence to the Commission, Judge van Wyk, probably ought to have mentioned it; after all, he was ready to include other negative or absurd references to Tsafendas while omitting all the positive ones. The conclusion must be that, as with the police, Tsafendas made no mention of the tapeworm when he testified to the Commission.

Tsafendas also seemed to be aware that his act would have a positive impact to some people in South Africa. Major Rossouw, in evidence to the Commission, said: "When I originally questioned him, I accused him of being a horrible murderer. To which he answered, 'That is what you think but the world thinks differently!'" At a later stage, I asked ⁶⁹⁹⁴ Cleanthes Alachiotis in a personal interview, 29 September 2010; Nikolaos Billis in a personal interview, 12 June 2011; Nikolas Kambouris in a personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 16 January 2016.

⁶⁹⁹⁵ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

him whether he regretted his deed yet and he answered that he did feel remorse and that he was very sorry about what he had done.”⁶⁹⁹⁶

Tsafendas's initial reaction seems to reflect his belief that many in South Africa would have applauded the assassination. As for feeling remorse at a later stage, the likelihood is that this remark was a gesture of appeasement to the police who had been torturing and beating him systematically since his apprehension. Statements by Tsafendas at the time and over subsequent years demonstrate that he never regretted killing Dr. Verwoerd. Thirteen days after the assassination, he told the police he “thought it was the right thing to do,”⁶⁹⁹⁷ and the Commission reported that “he showed no signs of remorse” during its deliberations.⁶⁹⁹⁸

Several witnesses who knew Tsafendas very well like Ira Kyriakakis, Father Nikolas Banovic, Katerina Pnema, Helen Grispos, Fotini Gavasiadis, Nick Papadakis, Mary Eendracht, John and Antony Michaletos, Nick Augustides and Andreas Babiolakis stated to the author that Tsafendas was a passionate Communist who considered Dr. Verwoerd to be a tyrant, a dictator, and “Hitler's best student.”⁶⁹⁹⁹ Tsafendas kept characterising Dr. Verwoerd with those words as long as thirty years after the assassination.⁷⁰⁰⁰ Describing Verwoerd as “Hitler's best student” was a trademark characterisation of South Africa's Prime Minister by Tsafendas and one which he used constantly. Tsafendas also constantly employed two particular words to describe Verwoerd: “tyrant” and “dictator.” He considered that Verwoerd was a “tyrant” because he was oppressing South Africa's non-Whites, and a “dictator” because he was elected by the Whites only; since the country's majority non-Whites did not have the vote, Verwoerd was not democratically elected in Tsafendas's view, and was in essence a dictator.⁷⁰⁰¹

⁶⁹⁹⁶ Major Daniel Rossouw testimony to the COE, 14 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

⁶⁹⁹⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 19 September 1966. COE, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁶⁹⁹⁸ Chapter II D, Paragraph 18.

⁶⁹⁹⁹ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Antony Michaletos in a personal interview, 2 May 2016; John Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁷⁰⁰⁰ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁷⁰⁰¹ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Elias Constantaras in a personal interview, 11 April 2015; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015; Nikolas Kambouris in a

Andreas Babiolakis told the author that Tsafendas never made an attempt to hide his detestation for colonialism and apartheid. Tsafendas told Babiolakis one day that “Verwoerd and [Portuguese Prime Minister] Salazar are fascist dictators and should be executed like Mussolini.”⁷⁰⁰² Six years after the assassination, Tsafendas proudly told anti-apartheid activist and Umkhonto we Sizwe fighter Alexander Moumbaris, a fellow prisoner in Pretoria Maximum Security Prison, “I got τον Νταή τους” (“their tough guy” or “their champion,” but in a pejorative sense).⁷⁰⁰³

Sometime in 1994, when Tsafendas was in Pretoria Prison hospital and apartheid had collapsed, Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis asked him, “Why did you do it, Mr. Tsafendas [kill Verwoerd]?” Tsafendas told the priest that he considered Verwoerd to be “a dictator and a tyrant” and that because he was the “brains behind apartheid,” he hoped his death would lead to the collapse of that racist policy. He knew everything would not be transformed overnight, but he hoped Verwoerd’s “removal” would be a stepping stone towards the end of apartheid.⁷⁰⁰⁴

Tsafendas denounced the slain Prime Minister as a “monster” and an “evil person,” and set out in detail the steps Verwoerd had taken to establish his iron rule and earn his title, “the architect of apartheid.” Tsafendas told Bishop Ioannis that “Verwoerd was a dictator and a tyrant who oppressed his people. People were like slaves. He created apartheid... Even if you had lived here, you would not have been able to tell of its real extent [of apartheid] unless you had lived with Coloureds and Blacks. People were like slaves, they were only living to serve the Whites. Verwoerd did that. He was a monster, almost as bad as Hitler. I call him ‘Hitler’s best student’ because he copied some of Hitler’s Nurnberg Laws and applied them to the Blacks here... Verwoerd would have done to the Blacks what Hitler did to the Jews if he did not need them to serve the Whites.”⁷⁰⁰⁵ personal interview, 17 January 2014; Georgios Kantas in a personal interview, 11 January 2012; Antony Michaletos in a personal interview, 2 May 2016; John Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016; Nick Papadakis in a personal interview, 30 January 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015; Michalis Vasilakis in a personal interview, 17 March 2016.

⁷⁰⁰² Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016.

⁷⁰⁰³ Alexander Moumbaris in a personal interview, 13 December 2015.

⁷⁰⁰⁴ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁷⁰⁰⁵ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

Tsafendas then argued that his act was morally justifiable because Verwoerd was a tyrant and a dictator. He said that since he had the opportunity to rid the world of such monster, it was his “duty,” his “social responsibility” to do so, a “tyrannicide.” Tsafendas also argued that if he had not acted, his guilt would have equalled that of Verwoerd, because any person who is aware of a crime and does not intervene, or worse allows it to continue when he has the power to end it, is as guilty as the criminal himself. Father Minas disagreed with all this and reminded him that he had killed a man and that was unacceptable and a mortal sin, no matter who the person was and what he had done. Tsafendas then put this question to Bishop Ioannis and Father Minas,

“Every day, you see a man you know committing a very serious crime for which millions of people suffer. You cannot take him to court or report him to the police, because he is the law in the country. Would you remain silent and let him continue with his crime, or would you do something to stop him?”⁷⁰⁰⁶

Both priests replied that they would have wanted to stop the crime but they would not have killed a person to stop it. Tsafendas said, “Then you would have been as guilty as Dr. Verwoerd.” The debate went on and on, but Tsafendas refused to accept that he was wrong, producing arguments and counter-arguments to support his contention. He even used examples from history where tyrants and dictators were executed by the people. He characterised the lynching of the Italian dictator Benito Mussolini and the killing by partisans of Reinhard Heydrich, Gestapo chief and one of the architects of the Holocaust, as justifiable and as tyrannicides.⁷⁰⁰⁷

Sometimes, Tsafendas, in the presence of the priests, would proudly make a stabbing gesture and denounce Dr. Verwoerd yet again as “Hitler’s best student.” He told them that at first, he intended to kidnap the Prime Minister and offer to exchange him for political prisoners. When he realised that this was not possible, he considered placing a bomb in Parliament to kill all the MPs. However, he dismissed this idea because journalists and other innocent people and the only “good” MP, Helen Suzman, could also have died.⁷⁰⁰⁸ Tsafendas always referred to his killing of Dr. Verwoerd as “the execution.” He refused to use the word ⁷⁰⁰⁶ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁷⁰⁰⁷ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁷⁰⁰⁸ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

assassination. When the priests referred to “the assassination,” Tsafendas would invariably correct them, saying, “the execution!”⁷⁰⁰⁹ Tsafendas also always maintained to Liza Key that he had killed Dr. Verwoerd for political reasons; because he was an “immoral man” and “disagreed with his policies” as he specifically told her.⁷⁰¹⁰

⁷⁰⁰⁹ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁷⁰¹⁰ Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997; Liza Key in a personal interview, 6 April 2015.

Let us now examine the other parts of this chapter.

Paragraphs 1-2: Tsafendas's Mental State

The Commission immediately refers to Tsafendas's mental state, claiming flatly that he is not a normal person and stating that it accepts the Supreme Court's finding of mental disorder. It then lists reasons, which it says "undoubtedly inflicted severe psychological damage" on Tsafendas (Paragraph 3).

The Commission heard 105 witnesses and it seems that only Wilhelmina Sophia de Vos questioned Tsafendas's mental state, testifying that "at times his conversation was confused" and her impression was that "he was mad."⁷⁰¹¹ However, she had given a completely different statement to the police, saying she "considered him to be a completely normal person."⁷⁰¹² We cannot know why de Vos told the Commission something totally different to what she told the police. Perhaps she was influenced by what she had heard in court. The fact is that no-one else said anything about Tsafendas not being a normal person. On the contrary, whoever commented on his mental state said he was perfectly normal. This is discussed in detail in the section 'Mental State' of this chapter. This was the same with the one hundred and fifty people questioned by the police, all of whose statements were in the Commission's possession. Only three of these witnesses, Barbeau, Martincich and Johnston, testified negatively about Tsafendas's mental state and both their statements and reliability have been discussed extensively in the previous chapter.

Paragraph 3: The "causes" that "undoubtedly inflicted severe psychological damage" on Tsafendas

His unhappy childhood, his discovery that he was an illegitimate child and that he was not White, the fact that his family did not really accept him, as well as that to all intents and purposes he knew no fatherland, that practically no country would have him, and all the other knocks and blows referred to in his history, undoubtedly inflicted severe psychological damage.

⁷⁰¹¹ Chapter II C, Paragraph 65.

⁷⁰¹² Wilhelmina Sophia de Vos statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

The entire paragraph is inaccurate or distorted and clearly part of an attempt to support the idea that Tsafendas was mentally disordered. The Commission did not have a psychiatrist among its ranks but boldly set out factors it claimed affected Tsafendas's mind. More importantly the Commission did not have in its possession, as far as the author could establish based on the documents found in the NASA, any evidence to support such a conclusion. On the contrary, evidence found clearly shows a different Tsafendas.

His Family did not Really Accept him

The Commission claims that Tsafendas's family did not really accept him. That is quite wrong and the Commission held ample evidence suggesting the exact opposite. However, it chose to ignore the many oral and written statements witnessing to the contrary. The issue has been discussed earlier in this chapter, so it will not be examined again.

Unhappy Childhood

It is wholly wrong to claim that Tsafendas had an "unhappy childhood." None of the two hundred or so witnesses who were questioned by the police or the Commission said anything to that effect and no other evidence has been found to justify such a claim. None of those who knew Tsafendas from childhood made any such comment. On the contrary, Dr. Samuel Schmahmann, a classmate in his school at Middleburg, giving his memories shortly after the assassination, recalled Dimitri as "a popular boy and not the least introverted... I particularly remember him singing a Greek song at a school concert," he said. "He was very funny and had us all in stitches."⁷⁰¹³

Another schoolmate, William Mare Volbrecht, a psychologist who was questioned by the South African police at the same time, testified that "At that stage Tsafendas was seen as white and there was never anything that pointed to someone regarding or treating him as a non-white or to him being discriminated against. I cannot remember whether he was ever guilty of misconduct; he was never a loner and mingled freely with us."⁷⁰¹⁴ Tsafendas's

⁷⁰¹³ Rand Daily Mail, September 8, 1966, 'Boyhood days of Tsafendas.'

⁷⁰¹⁴ William Mare Volbrecht statement to the police, 3 October 1966. K150, Vol 3, File Verklaring deur Majoor Venter. NASA.

stepmother, Marika, told the police that Dimitri's "association with other children at this stage [in childhood], was good."⁷⁰¹⁵

In addition, Tsafendas was always treated as a full-member of the family and there was never the slightest indication that this was not the case. Marika testified to the Commission that Tsafendas "had grown up as one of her children."⁷⁰¹⁶ Katerina Pnema made a similar statement to the police shortly after the assassination. She said that growing up with Tsafendas "to all intents and purposes it was understood" by "her and her brother and sisters" that "he was a member of the family... his complexion was such – as also his manner – that he passed as a European."⁷⁰¹⁷

The Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali shortly after the assassination questioned several Greeks who knew Tsafendas. It wrote in its confidential report to the South African police, "It is also reliably reported that the Tsafandakis family hold a good reputation among the Greek community and there are suggestions that Michael Tsafandakis made a big mistake in attempting to raise his illegitimate son as a full member of his family."⁷⁰¹⁸

Guglielmo Conte, a very good friend and business partner of Tsafendas's father, who knew Tsafendas from the day he was born, explicitly denied in an interview with the Rand Daily Mail that was in possession of the Commission, that Tsafendas was not accepted by his family.⁷⁰¹⁹ Costas Michaletos, who knew Tsafendas from infancy and was his father's best friend, told the police that "Dimetrios Tsafantakis grew up with his half-brothers and sisters and was always treated as part of the family."⁷⁰²⁰ All this information was known to the Commission

Helen Grispos was a near neighbour of Tsafendas and grew up with him in Lourenço Marques. Her mother, was Marika's best friend and her future husband, George, was one of Tsafendas's best boyhood friends. She described Tsafendas to the police as "well-mannered ⁷⁰¹⁵ Marika Tsafantakis statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁷⁰¹⁶ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

⁷⁰¹⁷ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁷⁰¹⁸ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 13 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁷⁰¹⁹ Rand Daily Mail, 17 September 1966, Tsafendas timid and puny as a boy.'

⁷⁰²⁰ Costas Michaletos statement to the police, 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

and intelligent”⁷⁰²¹ and made no comments about his childhood. However, in a personal interview, she dismissed the claim of an unhappy childhood. She remembers Tsafendas playing every day in front of her house with the other children and sometimes taking her, along with his stepsisters, to the beach in Lourenço Marques to teach her how to swim.⁷⁰²²

First cousin Mary Eendracht told the author that “it is a lie if someone says that Dimitri had an unhappy childhood. A big lie. He was full of life as a child. Very happy, friendly, very lively. He was very, very naughty, but just as some children are, especially boys, but nothing bad.” Eendracht also agrees that Tsafendas mixed freely with children of all races and never had an issue with his colour or identity.⁷⁰²³

Ira Kyriakakis, who grew up with Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques, was asked by the author if Tsafendas had an unhappy childhood and replied, “No, this is a mistake. Dimitri was very happy as a child. I don’t remember ever seeing him being unhappy. He was like all the other children, playing in the street, chasing each other. I remember he liked a lot playing hide and seek. He once hid in the top of a tree, just close to where I was. I never thought of looking up there as it was too high and I did not think that he would have climbed up there. He liked climbing trees.”⁷⁰²⁴ Andreas Babiolakis, another childhood friend, also disagreed about Tsafendas having an unhappy childhood. “That’s nonsense,” he said, “Dimitris was what we say the life of the party. He was full of energy and life. Absolute nonsense that he was unhappy.”⁷⁰²⁵

His younger half-sister, Katerina Pnefma, dismissed the Report’s comment as a “lie.” She told the author:

“Dimitri was a very happy but also a naughty child. He would spend all the time that he was not at school playing around the house. He loved playing. My mother had to go out in the street and scream his name to him to come back to the house when it was getting dark. He would always come home with dirty clothes from playing, but my mother did not mind; next day she would give him clean clothes again ... he loved the sea. He would often go there for swimming. He was an excellent swimmer. He taught all of us and many other children how to ⁷⁰²¹ Confidential Security Report of the Special Branch of the British South African Police in Umtali, Subject: Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. 10 September 1966. K150, Vol. 3, Sub file: 1/5. NASA.

⁷⁰²² Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013.

⁷⁰²³ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014.

⁷⁰²⁴ Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015.

⁷⁰²⁵ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016.

swim, even the little blind boy I told you before ... while there was light, Dimitri would spend his time out of the house, playing with other children. Sometimes, he would come to the house only to eat. Every evening though or when it was dark, he would spend it reading a book. He always read a book before he went to sleep. As far as I can remember he was reading every day... he was like any other child I knew, it is a lie to say that he was unhappy.”⁷⁰²⁶

The facts are that Tsafendas was nurtured lovingly by his family while the one element that would have made him appear separate or different, the knowledge of his parentage, was withheld from him out of consideration for his feelings. The most important witness to his childhood happiness is Tsafendas himself, who always spoke very fondly of his family and his childhood to several witnesses, including Liza Key, David Beresford, and Fathers Nikola Banovic, Minas Constandinou and Michalis Visvinis and Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis.⁷⁰²⁷

Illegitimate Child and not being White

Tsafendas learned that he was illegitimate not as a small boy but when he was seventeen, thus at an age when the discovery would affect him less. That said, he was disturbed to discover that Marika was not his mother. He was unhappy that he never met his real, half-African mother, but he was not concerned, as the Commission claimed, that he was not White. According to the Commission, Marika testified that *“Tsafendas only learned that he had coloured origins when he looked for work at the aircraft factory. He had grown up as one of her children. He was depressed after he had learned about this, but never said anything about it.”*⁷⁰²⁸ Her statement is confirmed by several people who associated with Tsafendas at the time.

Mary Eendracht, Tsafendas's first cousin who had grown up with him in Egypt and Lourenço Marques, knew him extremely well. She was in Lourenço Marques when Tsafendas found out about his parentage. She said, “He was not the least bothered about the fact that his real mother was Black, I don't think he cared at all about it, but he was devastated that he did not meet her. That made him very sad, he was really very sad about it."⁷⁰²⁹ His stepsister, Katerina Pnema, and childhood friends Andreas Babiolakis, Helen Grispos and Ira Kyriakakis, who were also around at the time, agree with the above statement. Tsafendas never said anything to them about his mother being Black, but he was devastated that he had not met her.⁷⁰³⁰ Tsafendas sometimes expressed his sadness that he never met her to Father Minas Constandinou who visited him in prison and the hospital for about ten years.⁷⁰³¹

⁷⁰²⁶ Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 29 March 2015.

⁷⁰²⁷ Dimitri Tsafendas in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997; Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Liza Key in a personal interview, 6 April 2015; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015; Father Michalis Visvinis in a personal interview, 11 July 2015.

⁷⁰²⁸ COE report regarding visit to family members of Demitrio Tsafendas, Pretoria, 21 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, Sub file: 5, Subject: Algemeen. NASA.

All the above witnesses and everyone interviewed by the author said that Tsafendas never had an issue with colour – other people's or his own. He considered that all people were equal and had equal rights and he freely associated and played with Black and White children. He had a Black girlfriend named Stella when he was a teenager while his best friends were White Greeks, like George Grispos and John Michaletos and Black Mozambicans like Manuel and the blind boy. He later also had both Black, Coloured and White friends, including girlfriends. Tsafendas was certainly saddened that he did not meet his birth mother, as most people would be, and he sometimes expressed his sorrow about it. However, there is no evidence that it inflicted severe psychological damage on him, as the Commission claims.

No fatherland

The Commission claimed that Tsafendas "knew no fatherland (and) that practically no country would have him," and that these factors inflicted severe psychological damage on him. This, too, is wrong. Tsafendas was passionate about the country of his birth, Mozambique, which he considered to be his fatherland. He spent the first twenty years of his life there and then was exiled due to his anti-colonialist and Communist beliefs and activities. He was a passionate and devoted partisan for the independence of Mozambique. Tsafendas, even in exile, was more passionate, active and caring for the cause of Mozambique's independence than many who lived permanently in Mozambique itself. How passionate and ⁷⁰²⁹ Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014.

⁷⁰³⁰ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Helen Grispos in a personal interview, 22 January 2013; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 29 March 2015.

⁷⁰³¹ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

devoted is evident from a confidential letter which the Chief Inspector of PIDE in Lisbon sent to the Sub-Director of PIDE in Mozambique, just two days after the assassination. The senior officer instructed his subordinate that any “information indicating Tsafendas as a partisan for the independence of your country should not be transmitted to the South African authorities, despite the relations that exist between your delegation and the South African Police.”⁷⁰³²

Although this letter and the wider extent of Tsafendas's involvement in the fight for Mozambique's independence were not known to the Commission, several significant factors were. They included the following:

- A PIDE report which said that “one finds in him an obvious spirit of rebellion against the Portuguese Administration, and a clear adhesion to the independence of Mozambique.”⁷⁰³³
- That he was “arrested on several occasions after creating public disturbances including shouting pro-Communist and anti-Portuguese slogans.”⁷⁰³⁴
- That he had spent three months in jail in Beira after he was accused of “making subversive propaganda against the Portuguese government and spreading subversive propaganda among the native masses.”⁷⁰³⁵
- That he wanted to see a “Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they white or black, and therefore separated from the Mother nation.”⁷⁰³⁶
- Tsafendas himself had also admitted to the Commission that he had attempted to recruit people for an uprising in Mozambique.⁷⁰³⁷

As for the Commission's comment that “practically no country would have him,” this is misleading and inaccurate. Tsafendas was banned from entering Mozambique and South Africa due to his politics. Although angered that he was not able to live in these countries, ⁷⁰³² Top Secret letter of the head Inspector of PIDE in Lisbon to the Subdirector of PIDE in Mozambique regarding Demitrio Tsafendas, 8 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁰³³ Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁰³⁴ Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Lisbon, to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 7, File: 09/04 Suspect Persons Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷⁰³⁵ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT; Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁰³⁶ Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁰³⁷ Chapter II B, Paragraph 32.

where he had family, he considered his banishment as an honour, proud to be an enemy of fascist regimes. Far from being bitter or mentally affected, Tsafendas was happy to take what he saw as an honourable political stance against these two countries.⁷⁰³⁸ Father Nikola Banovic discussed the subject of Tsafendas's exile extensively with him while they lived together in Istanbul. Tsafendas told him, "When your enemies are banning you, that means that you are on a good path/road"⁷⁰³⁹ (a Greek expression, meaning you are doing something good, you are progressing well).

Tsafendas was not banned from any other country. He was deported from the United States, but this was after he had lived there for five years, and this was again because of his Communist beliefs. In Britain, he failed to get a residence permit, but he was able to live and work in other countries, which he did extensively, in Portugal, Germany, Greece and Turkey for example.

Paragraphs 4 and 7: Tsafendas's Character

The Commission devotes two paragraphs (4 and 7) to a series of negative and unfounded characterizations of Tsafendas's personality, omitting most of the positive statements in its possession while using every critical one. The parade of denigration – that he was maladjusted, rejected, frustrated, feckless, boastful, crafty and so on - suggests an attempt to belittle him as much as possible in people's eyes. Every characterization used by the Commission here was examined and dismissed as inaccurate in this chapter, in the 'Tsafendas's character according to the Commission' section. However, even if all of the Commission's negative characterizations of Tsafendas were true, they were irrelevant to his motives. A man could have all the characteristics mentioned yet still hold strong political principles. At the end of the day, Tsafendas volunteered clear political reasons for killing Dr. Verwoerd which were omitted from the Report.

⁷⁰³⁸ Andreas Babiolakis in a personal interview, 19 March 2016; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Mary Eendracht in a personal interview, 9 October 2014; Ira Kyriakakis in a personal interview, 27 March 2015; Katerina Pnema in a personal interview, 30 March 2015.

⁷⁰³⁹ Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

Paragraph 5: Tsafendas's Political Activities and Ideas

Here, the Commission acknowledges some of Tsafendas's political activities and ideas, but the five lines it devotes to them scarcely scratch the surface of his interests. Among the very important facts missing are that he was exiled from Mozambique because of his Communist and anti-colonialist activities, his participation with the Communists in the Greek Civil War, his arrests and imprisonments by the Portuguese because of his anti-colonialist and Communist activities in Mozambique, his association in London with leading anti-apartheid activists such as David Gardener, Solly Sachs and Rev. Canon Collins. That he considered Dr. Verwoerd to be a dictator and a tyrant and had expressed his willingness to do anything to get the South African regime out of power are also omitted.

The Commission then speculates that the "discontent" felt by the crew of the Eleni might have affected Tsafendas's mind. The issue of the crew's alleged "discontent" has been discussed and explained in the previous chapter and has clearly been misunderstood by the Commission. The crew, most in their early twenties, had no idea what apartheid was when they arrived in South Africa and it was Tsafendas who "enlightened" them. He asked the men to boycott South Africa's economy by spending as little money as possible and he took some of them to a township in Cape Town to see for themselves the hardships of apartheid. As a result, the crew became upset about the race-based policy of apartheid; Mastromanolis said that the South Africans need "a good whipping" and Zafiriadis commented that the South Africans "should be a taught a lesson." Thus, it was Tsafendas's exposure of apartheid that affected the crew rather than the crew's discontent affecting Tsafendas, as the Commission believed.

As for the claim that the crew's discontent was about the Immorality Act, this too was wrong. All of the thirteen Eleni crew who were present in Cape Town and were interviewed by the author dismissed the Commission's claim out of hand, pointing out that whoever wanted to, had sex with non-White women; no-one was bothered about the Act, it was simply ignored. After all, the men had easy access to White women in Cape Town and being seamen and travellers, they did not view sex with non-White women as a unique or sought-after experience.

Paragraph 6: The Idea to Kill Dr. Verwoerd

This paragraph focuses on when Tsafendas decided to kill Dr. Verwoerd. It is entirely speculative, using phrases such as it may be... it is probable... it is unlikely... However, Tsafendas had told the police “some days after I started working in the House of Assembly, all kinds of thoughts came to my mind about murdering the Prime Minister. I saw an opportunity of shooting the Prime Minister from the lobby...”⁷⁰⁴⁰

Paragraph 7: A Possible Motive?

This paragraph states in its entirety:

“In the clouded mind of this outcast, who was a complete failure, whose life meant practically nothing to him, was born a cunning plan to make use of his power to destroy the head of a Government which he hated.”

Again, the Commission characterizes Tsafendas in a negative fashion while attempting to explain why he killed Dr. Verwoerd. Although there is no mention of the tapeworm and the Commission admits that Tsafendas hated Dr. Verwoerd, the subject is never elaborated.

As for Tsafendas “the complete failure,” let us examine how much of a failure Tsafendas was. He was a teacher. He gave free English lessons for six months to Greek and Turkish students in Istanbul (1961) and on two different occasions (1935-1939 and 1964) did the same for poor children in Mozambique. He became an active member of the British anti-apartheid and anti-fascist movements, participated in demonstrations and smuggled anti-apartheid literature into South Africa. By standing up for his political beliefs, he was exiled for twelve years from Mozambique, while in Portugal he was prosecuted, arrested, imprisoned and tortured. He actively protested against Portugal’s forced cotton policy and toured villages in Beira trying to raise awareness of the independence cause and for this suffered further imprisonment and torture.⁷⁰⁴¹ He joined the Greek Communist Party and fought with its military wing, the DSE, during the Greek Civil War.⁷⁰⁴²

⁷⁰⁴⁰ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷⁰⁴¹ PIDE Confidential Report regarding Demetrio Tsafendas: no: 2707/64/SR, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁰⁴² Father Nikola Banovic in a personal interview, 21 August 2014.

He developed a list of political objectives and worked tirelessly at a hands-on level to achieve his goals of independence for Mozambique and political change in South Africa. He wanted “to create a resistance to the regime of South Africa and mentioned civil disobedience and anything that would get the South African regime out of power.”⁷⁰⁴³ He smuggled anti-apartheid literature into the country, urged visitors not to spend money which would boost the apartheid economy and finally killing the man he believed had “created apartheid” and was “the brains behind apartheid”⁷⁰⁴⁴ in the hope that this would bring about a change of policy.⁷⁰⁴⁵

Tsafendas fearlessly told PIDE agents who interrogated him that he wanted to see “a Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they white or black, and therefore separated from the Mother-nation,” adding that he was strongly in favour of the independence of Mozambique.⁷⁰⁴⁶ The fact that the Director-General of PIDE in Portugal instructed the Sub-Director of PIDE in Mozambique that “information indicating Tsafendas as a partisan for the independence of your country should not be transmitted to the South African authorities,”⁷⁰⁴⁷ implies that Tsafendas was politically significant and no useless failure. That PIDE deliberately hid his detailed file from the South African authorities implies that he was far from just a “daydreamer” or a failure and all these were the actions of a practical man with practical aims who had achieved much in his life.

As for being an outcast, this is also untrue. His relationship with his family and the Greek community is discussed in the relevant sections of this chapter. His contribution and interaction with society at large is also well documented in his biography and throughout the whole study. For example, an outcast is unlikely to volunteer to teach children without remuneration, as Tsafendas did in Mozambique and Turkey.

⁷⁰⁴³ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁷⁰⁴⁴ Father Minas Constantinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Father Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

⁷⁰⁴⁵ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷⁰⁴⁶ PIDE Record of questions, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁰⁴⁷ Top Secret letter of the head Inspector of PIDE in Lisbon to the Subdirector of PIDE in Mozambique regarding Demitrio Tsafendas, 8 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

Paragraph 8: The Assassination Plan

This paragraph concerns Tsafendas's reported answers to the Commission's questions regarding the pistol and the assassination plan which the Commission describes as unacceptable and where Tsafendas seems to have lied. However, Tsafendas had given accurate and perfectly reasonable explanations of these issues to the police on at least two occasions and the Commission was aware of this. For example, the Commission says that "His explanation to the Commission that he had bought the pistol and knives for self-defence is unacceptable." However, Tsafendas had told the police that he bought the pistol in order to shoot Dr. Verwoerd.⁷⁰⁴⁸

The Commission itself had written in Chapter II D, Paragraph 1, that "According to a statement made by Tsafendas, he wished to buy the pistol in order to shoot Dr. Verwoerd. When he was unable to obtain a pistol, he decided to use a knife." Thus, even if Tsafendas gave the answers he did to the Commission, was he not questioned about his previous statement to the police? Obviously, Tsafendas's statement to the police made more sense than his answer before the Commission and had all the appearances of truth. The Commission was in position to know that as it had his police statement in its possession.

More importantly, the Commission accepted Tsafendas's account to the police regarding his movements prior to the assassination and the sale of the pistol when dealing with his movements before the assassination and the killing itself. That is why it used a lengthy extract from Tsafendas's statement to the police to describe the events. However, when it comes to the issue of motive, the Commission uses the false statement Tsafendas gave to the Commission and not the truthful one he gave to the police. It seems that the Commission preferred to use the lie rather than the truth in order to discredit Tsafendas.

Paragraph 9: The Assassination

The final paragraph of the Chapter deals with the assassination and no reference to motive is made.

⁷⁰⁴⁸ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

CONCLUSION

Although this chapter is headed "Demetrio Tsafendas's Motives," very little is adduced as to why Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd. The greater part of the nine-paragraph chapter is dedicated to presenting Tsafendas in a wholly negative way, with unfounded and tendentious characterizations clearly intended to discredit and belittle him. Some paragraphs speculate about what might have triggered Tsafendas's act, when Tsafendas had already explained to the police in detail his reasons for the killing.

Despite the Report's efforts to present Tsafendas as mentally disordered, there is no mention of the tapeworm, whereas at the summary trial the tapeworm was said to have played a major part in the assassination. However, Tsafendas had never mentioned the tapeworm to the police, nor apparently did he mention it to the Commission, thus making it impossible for Judge van Wyk to include such a reference in his Report.

The main conclusion of the chapter is that Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd because he hated the government. While it is true that Tsafendas hated the government, the specific reasons for his action, although known to the Commission, were not mentioned, namely that he believed Dr. Verwoerd to be a dictator and not the real representative of all the South Africans, and that he hoped a change of policy would take place after the assassination. These were the reasons he gave to the police and, as many as thirty years later, to three separate witnesses, Fathers Spiros, Ioannis and Minas. Although known to the Commission, the reasons were not included in the Report because they were incompatible with what was heard about him in court.

In omitting Tsafendas's own words, the Commission misrepresented his motives, obviously because his lucid, three-point explanation did not sound like the words of a madman, as the Commission wished to represent him. This chapter offers one of the clearest indications that the Commission did not want to give the real answers to the questions it posed but like so many other commissions of inquiry during apartheid, sought simply to present a picture that was convenient for and favoured by the government.

CHAPTER IV: WERE THERE ACCOMPLICES?

*The Commission could find no evidence which could justify a finding that there were accomplices. The probability is that it was the act of Demitrio Tsafendas and of no one else.*⁷⁰⁴⁹

The study agrees with the Commission and its analysis of all the issues mentioned in this chapter. However, some aspects need to be enlarged upon.

TSAFENDAS RECEIVING LARGE SUMS OF MONEY (Paragraph 3)

The Commission's conclusion – that there was no confirmation Tsafendas received large sums of money – is correct. Clearly, if Tsafendas possessed a great deal of money or was a paid assassin, he could have bought the gun from the Eleni crew as soon as he wished, without waiting until he was paid at the end of the month. Its price, 80 US Dollars, was not a huge sum for the average working South African, but it was a lot for a relatively poor man like Tsafendas.

BRAINWASHING (Paragraph 4)

“There were also speculations that Tsafendas might have undergone brainwashing overseas in the process of which he was instructed to murder Dr. Verwoerd. The Commission could find no evidence to justify such a finding. On the contrary, the weight of evidence indicates very strongly that Tsafendas did not come to South Africa with any such purpose...”

Again, the study agrees with the Commission, that there was no evidence Tsafendas was brainwashed to kill Dr. Verwoerd. If a foreign agency or power had done so, they would surely have provided him with a weapon or the money to buy one. Tsafendas had to wait until he was paid at the end of the month so that he could buy a pistol from the Eleni crew, having asked them already for a knife. Furthermore, Tsafendas only got the job in the Parliament, and thus access to Dr. Verwoerd, as a result of a chance encounter; it was not planned. As for brainwashing, consideration of Tsafendas's life and political development rules this out. His embrace of Communism and leftist politics in general, especially his unconcealed anticolonialist stance in Mozambique, go back to the late 1930s. His abhorrence of South African apartheid and its architect, Dr. Verwoerd, emerged in the early-mid-1950s when he became eager to take up arms against apartheid in a meaningful way. Since 1959, he had made clear that he would do “anything that would get the South African regime out of power.”⁷⁰⁵⁰

⁷⁰⁴⁹ Chapter IV, Paragraph 2.

It seems highly unlikely that some mysterious power “programmed” Tsafendas in 1959 or sometime before he returned to South Africa to kill Dr. Verwoerd and that he waited so many years to do it. Had he been so programmed, he would probably have made his move soon after he returned to South Africa in 1963. He lived for nine months in Pretoria when Dr. Verwoerd was also there, but Tsafendas made no move against him. In fact, he left after nine months for Mozambique, intending to live the rest of his life there. What thwarted this dream was being twice arrested and imprisoned by the Portuguese police. Seeing only a future of persecution in Mozambique, Tsafendas returned to South Africa in 1964. Finding himself in Cape Town was chance, something that would not have happened had Helen Daniels not written, asking him to marry her.

The Commission received several letters from ordinary citizens offering theories as to how a schizophrenic managed to get a job in the House of Assembly. Some suggested, without evidence of any sort, that Tsafendas was pretending to be insane to avoid the gallows, while others (see below) argued that Tsafendas was brainwashed. All of these letters shared two factors: a) none of the authors knew Tsafendas or anything about him except what they had read in the newspapers, and b) none of them offered even the slightest evidence to support their theories.

ALLAN LOMAS (Paragraph 7)

Lomas’s story sounds very like the scene at the Eleni shortly before it sailed from Cape Town, with someone asking about Dr. Verwoerd’s death before the assassination took place. The Commission seems to dismiss the story and it is probably correct to do so. Lomas initially claimed his wife was with him when he was asked about Dr. Verwoerd, but then he did not allow the police to speak to her. More importantly, she later denied knowledge of any such incident or that she was present.

⁷⁰⁵⁰ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

The author interviewed Mr. Lomas but he was unable or unwilling to shed more light on the incident, perhaps in part due to his advanced age. He told the author that the incident was “not like this,” meaning as it was presented in the newspaper, and that it was “a misunderstanding.” When asked what he meant, Lomas simply repeated that it was a “misunderstanding” and did not elaborate further. Lomas declined to discuss the matter further and continued to repeat that it was “a misunderstanding” and that it was “not like this.”⁷⁰⁵¹

⁷⁰⁵¹ Allan Lomas in a personal interview, 12 December 2014.

THE “BRAINWASHING” CONSPIRACY THEORY

How did the brainwashing rumour start? The culprit was the Church of Scientology and its founder, L. Ron Hubbard. Hubbard had opened several offices of his organization, the Hubbard Association of Scientologists International (HASI), in South Africa in the 1960s and had publicly expressed his support for Dr. Verwoerd and his policies.⁷⁰⁵² In 1966, he wrote a letter to Dr. Verwoerd, warning him that “a dangerous situation might exist in his vicinity.” The Prime Minister wrote back and thanked him. However, after the assassination, Hubbard claimed he became “persona non grata in South Africa.” This was after Hubbard publicly insinuated that Tsafendas was a Communist spy who had been incited by psychiatrists to assassinate Dr. Verwoerd in order to overthrow the government.⁷⁰⁵³ However, Hubbard produced no evidence for his bizarre theory. The brainwashing theory would come again to prominence after the collapse of apartheid firstly by Dr. Allan Bird. How is discussed in the next section.

Hubbard was not at the time the only member of the Church of Scientology to make such a claim about Tsafendas. John Browning McMaster, a member of the HASI in Durban, sent an affidavit and a memorandum to the Commission of Enquiry on October 12, 1966. His letter began, “I am a South African and support unswervingly the current Policies of this Government of South Africa at this time.” McMaster had a BA degree in Psychology and Political Philosophy and said in his letter he had also studied under the “direct training of L. Ron Hubbard, the Founder.” McMaster then wrote, “In February 1966, I emerged as the first Clear in the World and have since Toured both America and South Africa as such. A Clear is a person free from all reactive dictates of the subconscious mind and a product of the Technologies of Scientology. The fact that I am South African is of pride to me and I wish in all sincerity to have my country benefit from anything and everything that I have learned and can contribute. I have therefore compiled the attached memorandum.”⁷⁰⁵⁴

In his five-page memorandum, McMaster referred to the security measures of his organization, which, he said, were so effective no Communist could penetrate them, and he suggested that the Government should adopt these measures. McMaster presented scientology as an enemy of Communism and said HASI had developed a successful ⁷⁰⁵² Hubbard (1911-1986) was also racist, believing that Africans’ intelligence was very low to become useful members of his organization (Jones, 2012: 159).

⁷⁰⁵³ Jones, 2012: 157-161.

⁷⁰⁵⁴ John Browning McMaster affidavit to the COE. 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 6, File: 4. NASA.

programme for identifying Communists. He claimed that the organization had been using these methods “over the years with increasing success, in order to eliminate any Communistic Element from our organisations. The success and survival of our organisations bears testament to the fact that our Security measures against Communism are very effective. It is with sincere concern for the effects Communism has already generated in our Country, the Republic of South Africa, that the above memorandum is respectfully submitted.”⁷⁰⁵⁵

Claiming that Tsafendas was brainwashed by Communist agents, McMaster wrote that “in a Scientology Organisation, it is very unlikely that such a man would have remained employed for longer than a couple of days.” In urging the Government to adopt scientology’s measures, he noted that they were very “economical.”⁷⁰⁵⁶ However, like his leader, McMaster offered no evidence as to how, where and when Tsafendas was brainwashed.

Scientology’s allegations of a Communist conspiracy involving psychiatrists and brainwashing did not stop with Tsafendas. In 1968, Hubbard stated that the World Federation of Mental Health was “an ideal tool for furthering international Communist causes and is well used for this purpose.” Going further, he claimed that the National Council for Mental Health in South Africa, which belonged to the World Federation of Mental Health, as well as South African psychiatrists, were also part of a conspiracy, not only against the South African government but against scientology, too.⁷⁰⁵⁷ Despite the total lack of proof, Hubbard’s absurd conspiracy claims found support among some people who later reproduced them.⁷⁰⁵⁸

On April 20, 1972, the brainwashing theory resurfaced in the South African press, more specifically through Die Vaderland. Dr. Willie Visser, a psychologist from Port Elizabeth, claimed that Tsafendas had assassinated Dr. Verwoerd “quite possibly” under duress from intensive brainwashing and after strong-hypnotic suggestions. Like Hubbard, Dr. Visser did not produce any evidence to prove his contention, although he admitted that this was just a theory about something which might “quite possibly” have taken place.⁷⁰⁵⁹

Three years later, ignoring Dr. Visser’s caution that his argument was purely theoretical, B.M. Schoeman in Die Sluipmoord op Dr. Verwoerd (The Assassination of Dr.

⁷⁰⁵⁵ John Browning McMaster memorandum to the COE. 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 6, File: 4. NASA.

⁷⁰⁵⁶ John Browning McMaster memorandum to the COE. 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 6, File: 4. NASA.

⁷⁰⁵⁷ Jones, 2012: 160-162.

⁷⁰⁵⁸ For a detailed account of Hubbard’s theory and the reasons behind it see Tiffany Fawn Jones (2012) Psychiatry, Mental Institutions, and the Mad in Apartheid South Africa.

⁷⁰⁵⁹ Schoeman, 1975: 64-67.

Verwoerd) accepted it as fact and asked questions such as where, when and by whom was Tsafendas brainwashed. The publications of Schoeman and Visser brought the brainwashing theory to the surface again and it was promoted eagerly by conspiracy theorists who conveniently overlooked the fact that there was not a single piece of evidence to support such a claim, except proceeded from the two men’s imagination. Then, in 1992, Jaap Marais, a leading adherent to the theory that Tsafendas was sane and part of a wider plot, argued that Dr. Visser’s theory had found a strong response in professional circles.⁷⁰⁶⁰ However, Marais did not provide any evidence to support his claim.

Despite all of the above, there is an important omission by the Commission’s Report which, if it had become known to the conspiracists, would certainly have further fuelled their brainwashing theory. On September 9, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Cape Town received a secret telegram from the South African embassy in Washington, DC. The telegram stated that a “very reliable source with first-hand knowledge” had informed the embassy that the U.S. Immigration authorities had a file on Tsafendas. The file contained “full particulars” of Tsafendas’s time in the United States. The telegram also said about Tsafendas that “He is understood to have shown under psychiatric treatment that he was unstable though not (not)⁷⁰⁶¹ insane, but type of man who would easily be used as instrument of Communist or hostile organizations. Impression of U.S. Immigration people at the time was that he had been manipulated and was under influence of someone or some organization.”⁷⁰⁶²

Presumably, the Commission, although aware of this telegram since it was found in the Commission’s records in the National Archives, omitted it so as not to add fuel to the brainwashing and Communist organizations theories, but also to avoid reference to Tsafendas’s mental health i.e. “not insane.” Just imagine what would have happened if Hubbard, Marais, Schoeman, Visser and company had known of this telegram.

⁷⁰⁶⁰ Marais, 1992: 204.

⁷⁰⁶¹ This is exactly how it appears in the telegram. There is a second ‘not’ within brackets.

⁷⁰⁶² Secret Telegram from S.A. Embassy, Washington to Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Cape Town, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 4, Sub file: 1/8. NASA.

DR. ALLAN BIRD'S CONSPIRACY THEORY

Some thirty years after the assassination, Dr. Allan Bird, a South African neurologist, also suggested that Tsafendas might have been brainwashed.⁷⁰⁶³ He stated that Tsafendas was hospitalised in Brighton, where Dr. Solly Jacobson, a South African psychiatrist, anti-apartheid activist and member of the SACP, was practising. Dr. Jacobson had treated David Pratt, and Dr. Bird suspected that he might also have treated Tsafendas. Although this was merely a suspicion by Dr. Bird, based on no evidence at all, let us examine his theory.

Dr. Bird is completely misinformed about Tsafendas and gets all the basic facts wrong. He says that Tsafendas was sent to the Valkenberg mental hospital for observation during the judicial proceedings after the assassination.⁷⁰⁶⁴ That is wrong. Tsafendas was never sent to any hospital for observation, as we have seen. Dr. Bird then says that during the trial "corroborative" evidence was provided that he had been detained in mental hospitals in Britain for some years. The last was at Brighton.⁷⁰⁶⁵ No such evidence was produced at the summary trial. The hospitals in Britain mentioned were St. Pancras in London and the Whitecroft on the Isle of Wight. The hospitalizations had lasted a few months and not some years. More importantly, both hospitalizations had taken place in 1959, at which time, according to Dr. Bird himself, Dr. Jacobson was in South Africa and so could not have treated Tsafendas.

Indeed, the dates given by Dr. Bird prove that Tsafendas and Dr. Jacobson never met. According to Dr. Bird, Dr. Jacobson must have arrived in England in September 1963 at the earliest. In August and September of 1963, Tsafendas was in Lisbon, where the Portuguese government gave him amnesty and permission to return to Mozambique.⁷⁰⁶⁶ A few weeks later, in October 1963, he sailed to Mozambique from Portugal.⁷⁰⁶⁷ PIDE, who held a detailed, 130-pages file on him, do not mention anything about a visit by Tsafendas to England in 1963, nor do the British or the South African authorities, and there is no record of Tsafendas himself mentioning such a visit to anyone. Furthermore, Tsafendas was in such a poor financial situation at that time that the Portuguese government's social services paid the ⁷⁰⁶³ Bird, 1992: 210-220.

⁷⁰⁶⁴ Bird, 1992: 213.

⁷⁰⁶⁵ Bird, 1992: 213.

⁷⁰⁶⁶ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷⁰⁶⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

fare for his voyage to Mozambique.⁷⁰⁶⁸ This makes it highly unlikely that he had the money to buy a ticket to England. In the highly unlikely event that he did return to England he could hardly have undergone a brainwashing programme from Dr. Jacobson in the few days before he sailed to Mozambique.

On the basis of dates and his information alone, Dr. Bird's theory is untenable. Nevertheless, let us examine some other aspects. Both PIDE and South African police reports, along with British official reports and Tsafendas's own statements to the police, say that he was admitted to two hospitals in Britain, the Saint Pancras in London and the Whitecroft on the Isle of Wight, both in 1959. All these reports say the same thing and none of them mentions Brighton. According to the medical records, none of the doctors who treated Tsafendas in these hospitals was named Jacobson. None of the above sources mentions Tsafendas being in Brighton, while Tsafendas never spoke of being anywhere in England other than London and the Isle of Wight. It seems highly unlikely that the British authorities would have missed a hospital where Tsafendas was admitted in England. It seems equally unlikely that Tsafendas would remember all of the hospitals where he was admitted apart from the one in Brighton. Dr. Bird's theory contains several other inaccuracies that are not worth examining further, since his fundamental claim is palpably wrong.

The brainwashing claims become even more dubious with the knowledge that Tsafendas had contemplated other actions against apartheid which did not involve killing Verwoerd. Two of these were bombing the House of Assembly or sabotaging the pipeline that transported oil from South Africa to Rhodesia. In later life and after apartheid had continued for many years, Tsafendas wondered whether he could have delivered a greater strike against racial politics by blowing up the pipeline instead of killing Verwoerd, since that would have damaged the economies of both racist regimes. He believed he could have pulled off the job easily because he knew how to make bombs and, since he had worked on the pipeline, where to place them. He was confident he could have got away because he was intimately familiar with the area. However, when he was presented with "an once-in-a-lifetime opportunity" to rid South Africa of Verwoerd, he knew he could not ignore it.⁷⁰⁶⁹

⁷⁰⁶⁸ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷⁰⁶⁹ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013; Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis in a personal interview, 19 July 2015.

Finally, as stated earlier, Tsafendas found himself in Cape Town by chance and this would not have happened had Helen Daniels not written, asking him to marry her.

LOMAS INCIDENT AND CONSPIRACY THEORIES

Soon after the Lomas incident became known and even before the Commission had published its report, several people took it as proof that Tsafendas was not insane but a committed Communist and the assassination was a plot by his co-conspirators. For example, in October 1966, the Rhodesia and World Report wrote that the Lomas affair was proof that the assassination was “in preparation and expected;” it said, “this is not the action of a mad man, but that of a dangerous conspiracy; and we can guess who are the people and forces behind it.”⁷⁰⁷⁰

The Commission’s Report failed to convince everyone that Lomas was an unreliable witness and that he probably invented the incident. Instead, a range of doubters saw the Commission’s explanation as inadequate, even suspicious. Some openly questioned the handling of the incident and its dismissal, while others saw it as a sign that unknown parties were involved in the assassination. J.J.J. Scholtz, in 1967, was one of the first who wrote a book about the assassination, Die Moord op Dr. Verwoerd (The Murder of Dr. Verwoerd). He referred to the incident but was one of the few who chose not to criticise the Commission.⁷⁰⁷¹ B. M. Schoeman, in 1975, in Die Sluipmoord op Dr. Verwoerd, did not appear convinced by the Commission’s explanations and characterised the incident as “odd.”⁷⁰⁷²

The greatest sceptic was Jaap Marais, who openly criticised the Commission’s explanation and expressed doubts about its conclusion. Marais referred at length to the Lomas incident on two occasions, in his 1992 book *Die Era van Verwoerd (The Era of Verwoerd)*⁷⁰⁷³ and his 1994 pamphlet The Founders of South Africa. In 1994, he wrote:

“So, also in Europe (or Britain) there was some indication of an anticipated assassination of Dr Verwoerd. The Commissioner, instead of dealing properly with this as a most extraordinary event, gave a superficial account of enquiries made by someone (unnamed) at the SA Embassy in London. The Commissioner left the million dollar question

⁷⁰⁷⁰ Sheldon (Rhodesia and World Report), September/October 1966, Vol. 1, No. 5: 3, ‘The pattern of assassination. The continuing pattern.’

⁷⁰⁷¹ Scholtz, 1967: 120-123.

⁷⁰⁷² Schoeman, 1975: 58-60.

⁷⁰⁷³ Marais, 1992: 203-204.

unanswered: how is it possible that such a newspaper report could have been published on the day of the assassination if there had not been some prior anticipation that an attempt on Dr Verwoerd's life would be made? The Commissioner instead took it on him to discredit the man who gave the information to the newspaper merely on the evidence of an unnamed official who had described this person as someone who 'did not make a good impression', which is completely irrelevant to the matter of how the man concerned could have raised the question of assassination of Dr Verwoerd four days before the actual assassination. These two apparently unrelated occurrences (author's note: here he refers to the Eleni and the "is Verwoerd dead incident") shortly before the assassination irresistibly suggest a widely-planned action, about which some information had been leaked, either accidentally or intentionally."⁷⁰⁷⁴

The remainder of this chapter does not require further scrutiny and the study agrees with the Commission's conclusions.

⁷⁰⁷⁴ Marais, 1994: 14-16.

CHAPTER V: THE PERMIT FOR TEMPORARY SOJOURN

This chapter of the Report deals at length with the fact that J. J. van den Berg, passport control officer at the South African embassy in Lourenço Marques, issued a permit for temporary sojourn to Tsafendas despite Tsafendas's name appearing on the Department of the Interior's Stop List. Van den Berg claimed that he had checked the list under 'S' and not 'T', which the Commission found "unacceptable" as an excuse. It concluded that this was "a clear case of neglect of duty." What the Commission did not know was that van den Berg was bribed by Nick Vlachopoulos, Tsafendas's brother-in-law, and John Michaletos, Tsafendas's uncle who knew van den Berg personally. For a detailed account of the case and what happened to van den Berg see Chapter Four of this study.

CHAPTER VI: THE PERMIT FOR PERMANENT RESIDENCE

THE PERMIT

The Commission deals here with Tsafendas's permit for permanent residence in South Africa. It focusses mainly on procedural matters and how once again the fact that Tsafendas was on the Stop List went unnoticed. The permit issue is also discussed in Chapter II C, paragraphs 1-5. There it is stated:

“In his application for permanent residence, Tsafendas stated, inter alia, that he had been a sailor during the previous five years, that he had never before applied for permanent residence in South Africa, that he had never been deported from any country, and that he did not suffer from any mental disease... A medical certificate stating, inter alia, that he was not in any way mentally defective was attached to his application.”

Everything in Report's Chapter VI and the reference in Chapter II C regarding the procedure to get the permit appears to be accurate, but there are two very important omissions. The first is that Tsafendas attended three interviews with three different officers of the Department of Immigration and made a very favourable impression on all of them. That is why he was granted the permit.⁷⁰⁷⁵ This is significant in view of the evidence by the psychiatrists at the summary trial that Tsafendas was unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, that his speech was disjointed, he was unable to function on a reasonable level, and he suffered from thought-blocking and thought disorder. If Tsafendas was really like this, how did he manage to convince three different civil servants that he was perfectly fine?

Even if it is objected that these three men were not doctors of medicine, the response is that Tsafendas was also examined by two state doctors for the permit and they, too, found him to be perfectly healthy. The following covers the second omission by the Commission: although the Report refers to a medical certificate stating that Tsafendas was not mentally defective, there were in fact two certificates, both issued by the state doctors after they examined him. On November 11, 1963, Tsafendas was examined by Dr. C. Been for his permanent residence application and was found “not to be mentally or physically defective in any way,” and “generally in a good state of health.”⁷⁰⁷⁶ Dr. Been would later examine Tsafendas again “for burns on his body whilst employed at Pooles.” Again, nothing about his mental state was noted.⁷⁰⁷⁷ On November 14, 1963, Tsafendas was examined again in reference to his residence application, this time by Dr. A.C. McDonald, who wrote “a favourable report.” A certificate for permanent residence was subsequently issued.⁷⁰⁷⁸ If Tsafendas was as described by the doctors in the summary trial, would one of these two doctors not have noticed something, such as his alleged inability to follow a conversation or his thought-blocking?

⁷⁰⁷⁵ Memorandum about the application for permanent residence in terms of the Aliens Act from Demetrio Tsafendas, drawn up by the Secretary for Immigration, n.d. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

This chapter goes into great detail concerning the permit process, but in omitting Tsafendas’s examination by two state doctors, the Commission once again ignores facts which contradict or raise questions concerning evidence heard at the summary trial. Surely the fact that two state doctors found Tsafendas not to be mentally defective was too important a matter to be eschewed, despite the Commission’s evident wish to present Tsafendas in the opposite light.

LIMASOLLU NACI

An important factor in this chapter is the publication of the name of the college where Tsafendas worked in Istanbul, the Limasollu Naci, although it is misspelled here as Limasolla Nace College. The name appears to be written on a note, presumably by the official in the Department of the Interior who interviewed Tsafendas. The fact that the College’s name is given proves that it was known to the Commission and to the authorities. However, it appears that no enquiries were made about it.

⁷⁰⁷⁶ Demitrio Tsafendas medical certificate issued by Dr. Been for the Aliens Act, 1937. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

⁷⁰⁷⁷ Dr. Been statement to the police, 30 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷⁰⁷⁸ Memorandum about the application for permanent residence in terms of the Aliens Act from Demetrio Tsafendas, drawn up by the Secretary for Immigration, n.d. K150, Vol. 4, File: 1/7, Departement van immigrasie. NASA.

CHAPTER X: THE HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY

This chapter deals at great length with the way Tsafendas was appointed as a messenger in the House of Assembly. Five of Tsafendas's colleagues were interviewed by the Commission and the police and none of them said anything negative about Tsafendas or his mental state; he was described as an ordinary, normal man. Three of the employees interviewed Tsafendas for the position of messenger and all five worked with him for more than one month.

The Report states in Paragraph 12,

“The Commission is satisfied that the interview these three persons had with Tsafendas did not differ materially from other interviews they and their predecessors had with applicants over the years. The Commission is also satisfied that there was nothing in Tsafendas's behaviour from which it could be inferred that he was mentally disordered, or that there was any indication that he might become dangerous.”

The Commission deals extensively with the interview and how Tsafendas was appointed, but there is no reference to his work as a messenger. It was claimed at the summary trial that his work was unsatisfactory and that he was unable to do even a menial job like the messenger's. However, none of Tsafendas's five colleagues in the Parliament had anything negative to say about him or his mental state or his work abilities; on the contrary, he was described as a normal person, just like any other working there.

The most important omission from Chapter X concerns the references which Tsafendas used in order to get the job. The Commission specifically asked Sydney Wiehand, one of the senior messengers who interviewed Tsafendas, about references. This is the exchange between the Commission and Wiehand:

COMMISSION: And did he have any references?

WIEHAND: He had some references. There was one —

COMMISSION: What were these references?

WIEHAND: They were from different firms -

COMMISSION: Pardon?

WIEHAND: From different firms. One or two of them. I just can't remember how many, Sir-

COMMISSION: One or two?

WIEHAND: Yes, and then he had one - I think it was from a school — where he went to school, somewhere in Natal or the Transvaal. I can't remember, Sir. There's such a lot that I see.⁷⁰⁷⁹

Tsafendas later said that he had used the reference from the Limasollu Naci College in Istanbul in order to get the job.⁷⁰⁸⁰ Although the language college reference was not specifically named by the messengers, it seems highly unlikely that it was not found by the police among Tsafendas's belongings. It also seems an obvious question for the Commission to ask Tsafendas what references he used to get the job, especially since the messengers did not remember. However, it cannot be excluded that the Istanbul reference was never found by the police or seen by the Commission.

If it was found, however, would it have been mentioned? Many awkward questions would have followed: What was this college? How did Tsafendas get an outstanding reference from the best language college in Istanbul? How did he get a job as a teacher of English there? How did he keep the job for six months? All of this when he is supposed be a hopeless, certifiable schizophrenic without a hope of cure.

⁷⁰⁷⁹ Sydney William Wiehand testimony to the COE, 5 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Uittreksels uit Getuienis. NASA.

⁷⁰⁸⁰ Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

CHAPTER XI: THE POLICE

This chapter deals mostly with the files on Tsafendas and General van den Bergh's and Vorster's initial claim that the police had no file on Tsafendas. It turned out that the police had four files on Tsafendas and the general was initially misinformed or deliberately lied. Naturally, the Report attributes the police "mistake" to an innocent misunderstanding.

A SHORT SYNOPSIS OF OTHER ISSUES DISCUSSED IN THE REPORT

The Commission, in addition to investigating Tsafendas's life and movement, also inquired into matters of travel documentation and Parliamentary security, criticised certain procedures and individuals and issued a series of recommendations.

Regarding travel, it highlighted two failures. The first was that Tsafendas, a Portuguese, was allowed to enter South Africa, initially on temporary terms but thereafter for permanent residence, despite the fact that his name appeared on an official Stop List. The second concerned a delay of many months in processing an order for Tsafendas's deportation, something the Commission said could have been done in an hour.

The Report criticised officials in the Department of the Interior and on the Immigrants Selection Board for not noticing that Tsafendas had been named on the Stop List when in July 1964, he applied for a travel visa and when he returned nine months later. As for the deportation issue, it pointed out that on December 14, 1965, a high official of the Department of the Interior recommended that the Minister of the Interior should consider deporting Tsafendas, and that the Minister signed the necessary warrant on August 9, 1966.⁷⁰⁸¹

On September 1, 1966, the Ministry typed a letter to the police requesting service of the warrant but by September 6, the day Tsafendas assassinated Dr. Verwoerd, it had not been sent off. The Commission stated: "Under all these circumstances, it is clear that the delay from 14th December 1965 to 6th September 1966 is indefensible... one senior clerk would not have required longer than an hour to draw up all these documents."⁷⁰⁸² Subsequently in departmental disciplinary proceedings, two officials were found guilty of negligence in carrying out official duties, the one being reprimanded and the other admonished.

The Commission made three recommendations:

- A work-study be carried out into the organization and methods of the Department of the Interior;
- A list be compiled of anyone who had received treatment for mental disorders, such as Tsafendas, because "it is probable that a large number of assassinations, if not the majority, are committed by mentally disordered persons;”

⁷⁰⁸¹ Chapter IX, Paragraph 7.

⁷⁰⁸² Chapter IX, Paragraph 7.

- Consideration be given to whether medical practitioners should be obliged to submit to the Commissioner of Mental Health the names of patients who might become a danger to others.⁷⁰⁸³

As for Parliamentary security, the Commission dismissed the system for hiring temporary messengers as “hopelessly wrong.” This responsibility devolved upon the Chief Messenger, assisted by senior messengers, with reference to the Sergeant-at-Arms if doubts were raised as to an applicant.⁷⁰⁸⁴ The system created unnecessary risk, the Report said.⁷⁰⁸⁵ However, it acknowledged that since the assassination, there had been drastic changes in security measures. These were the best possible and had been adopted by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

⁷⁰⁸³ Chapter X, Paragraphs 18, 19, 20.

⁷⁰⁸⁴ Chapter X, Paragraph 12.

⁷⁰⁸⁵ Chapter X, Paragraph 17.

MISSING EVIDENCE AND THE ROLE OF GENERAL VAN DEN BERGH

As stated at the beginning of this chapter and was discussed extensively in chapter Four, it is indisputable that several statements by witnesses who testified to the Commission and to the police, along with other evidential items, are missing from the National Archives of South Africa. The missing evidence includes material collected by both the Commission and the police. The Commission had access to its own evidence when it was sitting, so obviously it went missing afterwards. As for the police evidence, the author cannot know whether or not this was given to the Commission and therefore exactly when it went astray.

Sixty-four of the 105 statements given directly by witnesses to the Commission cannot be traced. Among statements given to the police which are missing are those by Patrick O’Ryan and the crew of the Eleni. These were supposedly in the Commission’s possession during the proceedings. Furthermore, the Commission stated that:

*“Evidence was submitted to the Commission that Tsafendas had tried to recruit people to take part in an uprising in South Africa. He admits that he did in fact try to recruit people for an uprising, but says that his aim was confined to the Territory of Mozambique.”*⁷⁰⁸⁶

However, no such evidence was found in the archives. It seems inconceivable that the Commission would invent such a statement. After all, it was the Commission which suppressed knowledge of Tsafendas’s political activities. It would hardly then make up a story testifying to Tsafendas’s political activities.

While we must accept that the statements of those who testified before the Commission disappeared after the proceedings ended, we cannot be certain that all the evidence collected by the police was given to the Commission. There is no mention in the Commission’s Report of the statements collected by police from the Eleni seamen, except for the four whose statements were found in the archives. Therefore, it is very possible that their statements were never given to the Commission. However, it is also perfectly possible that the statements were supplied to the Commission, which simply suppressed them. After all, the Commission had suppressed important evidence that was certainly in its possession. The author is therefore not in a position to know with certainty which party suppressed the evidence. However, what is more important than the answer to this question is the fact that evidence was suppressed in order to misrepresent Tsafendas and his reasons for the assassination.

⁷⁰⁸⁶ Chapter II B, Paragraph 32.

The following incidents supports the theory that the Commission was responsible for a few, but not all, of the omissions from its Report, while the police also withheld some evidence. On 30th October 1966, The Post revealed that Tsafendas had joined the South African Communist Party in 1938. The article was written by Gordon Winter, a journalist of The Post but also an agent of the Security Police and a good friend of van den Bergh. Van den Bergh was not at all happy about the revelation and asked Winter to downplay it. Winter said about the incident: “HJ (van den Bergh) was unhappy about that aspect. He enjoyed the rest of the story, but that one aspect he was unhappy about, and that’s why he called me to Pretoria and said, ‘Do a deflation job here. Knock it down. He was an ineffective Red. He was just a procession man. They just used him to pad the numbers in the demos. Okay, Gordon?’ I said, ‘Yes, fine.’”⁷⁰⁸⁷

This incident is indicative of how van den Bergh operated and demonstrates how anxious he was to conceal or dismiss Tsafendas’s Communist activities. The SACP reference was not the only one. When Winter gave evidence to the Commission that Tsafendas had been in contact with some Russian seamen off Walvis Bay, this did not appear in the Commission’s Report, apparently because of van den Bergh’s intervention. Winter said about the incident:

“Another good example of how they closed up, closed ranks, and wiped out all trace of any suggestion that Tsafendas had been a successful communist or a keen communist was that I investigated a story in which I satisfied myself that Demetrios Tsafendas was in contact with Russian seamen on boats off Walvis Bay. There is no doubt about this whatsoever. And I gave evidence to the Commission of Enquiry, run by Judge van Wyk, into the reason and cause of death of Dr. Hendrik Verwoerd. I gave evidence to that commission, and my evidence was – quite easily for me to prove – that Tsafendas had been in contact with Russian seamen off Walvis Bay. It’s not a big story today. It’s not important whether he was or not. It’s not important that he could speak Russian with those people, whether haltingly or not... So I satisfied myself that Tsafendas had been in contact with Russian seamen. That doesn’t mean anything. But in the ‘reds under the bed’ scared atmosphere of South Africa, that’s a big story. I thought it was a great story...

⁷⁰⁸⁷ Gordon Winter in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness, 1997; Gordon Winter in a personal interview with Dr. James Sanders on behalf of the author, 19 August 2016.

Now, all this is a long histoire; it's nonsense; it's not important whether it's true or not. Whether Tsafendas was in contact with Russian seamen – who gives a stuff? My question to you is to ask the commission why that story didn't appear in the report issued by Judge van Wyk. No mention. I later found out why. HJ [General van den Bergh] told me he didn't want it in the report. 'No connection with red seamen, no way, we don't want that. He's a madman. No connection. No connection.'"⁷⁰⁸⁸

Winter's evidence before the Commission was supported by statements made by two of his colleagues on The Post, Mogamet Isaacs and Gordon Tobin. This evidence can be seen earlier in this chapter. No mention of it is made in the Commission's Report.

In 1976, van den Bergh asked Winter to visit Tsafendas in prison and write a propaganda article knocking down claims by The Observer newspaper in London that Tsafendas was being tortured in jail.⁷⁰⁸⁹ Winter agreed and visited Tsafendas several times, developing a good relationship with him, which was not surprising since he was Tsafendas's only visitor, apart from David Bloomberg who visited him twice in ten years. Winter repeated that Tsafendas was a one-time member of the South African Communist Party, although this had been revealed ten years earlier and the Commission had even written about it. Winter thought it was old news and water under the bridge, but again van den Bergh was unhappy that it was mentioned. Winter told David Beresford of the Guardian in 1998 about the incident:

"I believe Pretoria did not want there to be any suggestion whatsoever that Tsafendas was clever, or programmed, or politically affiliated in any way. As I explained to Liza and Sylvia when they filmed me in London, H J van den Bergh was horrified when I wrote that story in The Citizen stating that Tsafendas had joined the South African Communist Party in Johannesburg in 1939 which HJ van den Bergh then told me to 'water down' by writing a follow-up article in which he [van den Bergh] described Tsafendas as being an ineffective Red, and was just used as a crowd fodder in marches etc. All HJ wanted the public to believe was that Tsafendas was totally mad and that if he managed to get out of Death Row he would definitely kill again."⁷⁰⁹⁰

This is how van den Bergh described Tsafendas in the article:

⁷⁰⁸⁸ Gordon Winter in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997.

⁷⁰⁸⁹ The incident is examined in Chapter Six.

⁷⁰⁹⁰ Gordon Winter's correspondence with David Beresford, 8 September 1998. Liza Key's personal collection.

“It is true that Tsafendas joined the CPSA in the late 1930s, but he was completely ineffective as a member of the Party because he never really appreciated what communism was all about. He was totally incapable of converting other people to the communist cause and that is why they merely used him to fill the ranks whenever a street procession was mounted. I can tell you that no person in South African history has ever been interrogated as much as Tsafendas.”⁷⁰⁹¹

As for the concealment of evidence, it would not have been the first time General van den Bergh and the South African police had withheld important evidence from the judicial process. In March 21, 1960, after the Sharpeville massacre, a police unit including van den Bergh, then a captain, swooped on the hospitals where wounded demonstrators were taken and removed any corpses which showed evidence of injuries caused by illegal dum-dum bullets. Evidence concerning the use of such bullets and the ammunition rounds issued was conveniently “lost” or “misplaced” by the police. The police lied, hid and fabricated evidence to cover up their use of the dum-dums,⁷⁰⁹² which, under van den Bergh’s supervision and orders, proved quite effective.⁷⁰⁹³

After the massacre, van den Bergh was sent to the Baragwanath hospital, where policemen under his command dragged wounded people from their beds, manacled them and transported them to Boksburg Prison. There they were stripped naked, sprayed with water and ordered to dress again in their same, often blood-stained clothes. They were forced to wear unwashed for months afterwards to demonstrate what happened to “agitators.”⁷⁰⁹⁴ Judge Wessels, the sole member of the Commission of Inquiry into the Sharpeville Massacre, appointed van den Bergh to determine who shouted “shoot” and who fired the first shots that wounded peaceful demonstrators. Naturally, van den Bergh “failed” to discover the guilty parties.⁷⁰⁹⁵

Since van den Bergh and other police officers were able to lie, hide and fabricate evidence in 1960, they were certainly capable of doing so again six years later, especially since the Commission could not know what evidence the police had gathered. It was certainly ⁷⁰⁹¹ The Citizen, 26 October 1976.

⁷⁰⁹² Martin, 2007: 13.

⁷⁰⁹³ Frankel, 2001: 147-8; 154-6.

⁷⁰⁹⁴ Frankel, 2001: 194-195.

⁷⁰⁹⁵ Report of the Commission Appointed to Investigate and Report on the Occurrences in the Districts of Vereeniging (namely, at Sharpeville location and Evaton) and Vanderbijlpark, Province of the Transvaal, on 21st March 1960, 1960: 154; Roux, 1972: 408.

easier to suppress paper documents than remove corpses and wounded casualties from a hospital. Since van den Bergh was keen to discount Tsafendas's adherence to Communism, it is natural to assume that he would also want to conceal the fact that Tsafendas had fought with the Communists in the Greek Civil War and that he had once characterised a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd as justifiable, both political acts of greater importance than simply being a Communist Party member. Clearly, it was very easy to withhold evidence when the witnesses concerned did not give evidence to the Commission, and van den Bergh had all the statements in his possession. That would also explain why the statements from the Eleni went missing.

Playing fast and loose with unwelcome evidence was made much easier for van den Bergh just three years later, in 1969, when he and Prime Minister Vorster dreamed up the General Law Amendment Bill, whose notorious Clause 29 authorised the Prime Minister or his nominee (van den Bergh, of course) to prohibit oral or written testimony before any court or statutory body if they considered such evidence or document would be "prejudicial to the interests of the state or public security." This meant that the police and the security forces could conceal or ensure the unavailability of any document or evidence which might threaten their interest.⁷⁰⁹⁶ Thus, if Tsafendas's case had taken place in 1969, van den Bergh would have been in his rights to block unwelcome evidence. Not that it stopped him from doing so earlier, as, for instance, in the Sharpeville Inquiry.⁷⁰⁹⁷

The case of James Lenkoe, a Lesotho national living in Johannesburg, can also be used to demonstrate how section 29 may be employed in the interests of the authorities. Mr. Lenkoe, thirty-five, was arrested on the night of March 5, 1969, and was dead five days later. Warders at the inquest said he was found hanging by a belt from the window of his cell in Pretoria Local Prison. His wife could not identify the belt; she said he was not wearing one when arrested and he had left his only belt at home. Major J.T. Swanepoel denied that detainees were ever given electric shock treatment, but Dr. Alan Richards Moritz, a noted American pathologist, testified that a lesion on Mr. Lenkoe's toe was an electrical burn.⁷⁰⁹⁸

Mrs. Lenkoe announced her intention to sue the Prime Minister, the Minister of Police and Major Swanepoel for damages arising out of her husband's death. However, since section ⁷⁰⁹⁶ International Defence and Aid Fund, 1975a: 11.

⁷⁰⁹⁷ International Defence and Aid Fund, 1969a: 7-8.

⁷⁰⁹⁸ Bernstein, 1972: 30-31; International Defence and Aid Fund, 1969b: 7-8.

29 prohibits the giving of evidence “prejudicial to the interests of the State or public security,” either of the Ministers can issue a certificate preventing evidence of Lenkoe’s interrogation or discussion of the cause of his death. Such a procedure may also be used to stop civil actions seeking damages from the police for alleged assault. A factor affecting government thinking may be the rise in such actions, from 76 in 1966 to 117 in 1968. Section 29 will prove particularly useful to the State in the case of inquests into the deaths of persons in detention, and in circumstances where detainees have been charged and wish to claim that confessions were extracted from them under torture.???

Furthermore, in 1971, a security police agent and State witness against the Anglican Dean of Johannesburg in charges under the Terrorism Act was accused by Sydney Kentridge, the defence counsel, that he distorted and exaggerated his reports on the Dean.⁷⁰⁹⁹ Van den Bergh’s readiness to interfere with evidence was demonstrated again in 1976, this time in his personal interest, when he instructed officials in the Ministry of Information to destroy all “unnecessary documentation” that would have disclosed his involvement in the “information scandal.”⁷¹⁰⁰

Gordon Winter claimed that it was General van den Bergh who omitted evidence from the Commission and downplayed Tsafendas’s political activities, especially anything that had to do with Communism. Why? Winter’s explanation seems entirely logical:

“It’s an embarrassment for him [van den Bergh] that this man who was a) dangerous, b) mad, c) Coloured, got a job at the House of Assembly, and HJ’s policemen or security... it doesn’t matter about going to work Pelindaba or whatever you call it, for a uranium base or whatever. This is not a Kruger Park ranger job; we’re talking about in the House of Assembly. It’s embarrassing for HJ, the supremo of intelligence, for his mob to allow this lunatic – if he was a lunatic – into the House of Assembly, and he then went in with two daggers. That’s some security. No wonder they wanted to keep it quiet ... if there was a political motive, it’s hardly pro-South Africa. And if it was a political motive, surely wouldn’t the Kremlin get some benefit from that? A nice bit of propaganda. You don’t want that. The reds under the beds in South Africa were the enemy. We don’t let them score victories. Think about it. Its common sense.”⁷¹⁰¹

⁷⁰⁹⁹ Uys (The Guardian), 4 August 1971: 3, ‘Agent accused of distorting reports.’

⁷¹⁰⁰ Sanders, 1999: 62.

⁷¹⁰¹ Gordon Winter in Liza Key’s A Question of Madness. 1997.

It is also indisputable that documents from a number of important cases during apartheid have gone missing from the National Archives of South Africa. They include some 600 pages from Ahmed Timol's original inquest records.⁷¹⁰² It is logical to assume in such cases that evidence was removed by or on behalf of persons who wished to conceal their involvement and possible misconduct. In Tsafendas's case, it is not surprise that the statements which went missing were those he made which would have contradicted the Commission's findings. In fact, it is surprising that two statements which contradicted both the Court's and the Commission's conclusions were found in the Archives. It seems that whoever removed the other evidence missed these two documents. That is hardly surprising when the total of relevant documents exceeded 10,000.

Professor John Dugard is not surprised at all by the fact that the State concealed and manipulated evidence in order to mis-portray Tsafendas and his motive:

“Many South Africans suspected that there was a political cover-up in the Tsafendas case. The apartheid regime had two reasons for portraying Tsafendas to be insane. First, the regime wished to suggest that no one in his right mind could kill such a wonderful leader as Hendrik Verwoerd. Secondly, there was the security aspect. The security apparatus, led by the Minister of Justice and Police, John Vorster, wished to avoid accountability for allowing a political revolutionary to be employed in a position close to the Prime Minister. So it was that the media and the legal proceedings were manipulated to present Tsafendas as a mentally deranged person dictated to by a tapeworm.”⁷¹⁰³

⁷¹⁰² Nicolson (Daily Maverick), 12 October 2017, ‘Timol Inquest: He was murdered but culprits are dead, court rules.’

⁷¹⁰³ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 8 September 2016.

PUBLICATION OF THE COMMISSION'S REPORT

The report of the Commission was tabled in Parliament and published as a Blue Book (R.P. 16/1967) on 24th January 1967.⁷¹⁰⁴ Immediately upon publication, the government bureaucracy came in for serious criticism, particularly the departments of Immigration and Interior, along with the police. An MP for the opposition United Party, Grant Hughes, accused the Minister of the Interior, Senator Johannes de Klerk,⁷¹⁰⁵ of incompetence and bungling, stating that in any other country he would be pressed to resign. Hughes said that of the three departments under fire, the Interior was most to blame. De Klerk conceded that there had been negligence on the part of certain officials in his department, but his response was not accepted by the Leader of the Opposition, Sir De Villers Graaff. He argued that de Klerk had tried to play down the seriousness of his department's negligence.⁷¹⁰⁶

Another UP Member, J.O.N Thompson, asked what happened to the medical report on Tsafendas written by District Surgeon Dr. Kossew after he examined him on June 17. It was at this examination that Dr. Kossew diagnosed Tsafendas as schizophrenic. Thompson said, "Less than a fortnight later he was able to come into employment in this House. The Commission's Report did not reveal what happened to the report of the district surgeon."⁷¹⁰⁷ In essence, the Report achieved its main goal, which was to back the court's verdict and to assure nervous South Africans that the assassination was the act of a schizophrenic without any political motive who acted entirely alone. It also presented Tsafendas in such an unattractive light as to ensure that he would find no sympathy from the public.

⁷¹⁰⁴ Kahn, 1966: 3.

⁷¹⁰⁵ Father of F.W. de Klerk, the last apartheid President.

⁷¹⁰⁶ Rand Daily Mail, 28 January 1967: 2, 'Seriousness of negligence being 'played down.'

⁷¹⁰⁷ Rand Daily Mail, 28 January 1967: 2, 'Report is missing.'

COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO THE RESPONSIBILITY OF MENTALLY DERANGED PERSONS AND RELATED MATTERS

The issues arising from the van Wyk Commission and the Tsafendas case led to the appointment of a further Commission of Inquiry, chaired by Judge Frans Rumpff, to look at the criminal responsibility of the mentally ill, and to make recommendations in the public interest. Its remit included investigating the effectiveness of current regulations on the judging of criminal cases involving the mentally ill; methods for preventing such persons from committing acts dangerous to others; and the extent to which such persons could be judged responsible for their actions.

In 1967, the Commission issued its report, which recommended, among other things, that the doctrine of “irresistible impulse” in criminal responsibility should be abolished in favour of a criterion involving inability to act in accordance with an appreciation of the wrongfulness of an act. Eventually, ten years later, this recommendation was adopted in the Criminal Procedure Act.⁷¹⁰⁸

⁷¹⁰⁸ Strauss, 1996: 292; van Rooyen et al, 1976: 4.

CONSPIRACY THEORIES

Dr. Bird's, Dr. Visser's and Hubbard's brainwashing theories mentioned earlier were not the only conspiracy theories regarding Verwoerd's assassination. As with John F. Kennedy's assassination and the publication of the Warren Commission which named Harvey Lee Oswald as the sole assassin, Verwoerd's assassination and the subsequent Commission of Enquiry gave rise to a number of conspiracy theories. Despite Judge van Wyk's best efforts, not all South Africans were convinced that Tsafendas was a schizophrenic who killed Dr. Verwoerd because of a tapeworm. Some opponents espoused alternatives which were merely far-fetched, others which verged on the farther shores of lunacy.

In 2007, Mr. Petrus Cornelius Swanepoel, a former BOSS agent, wrote accurately that "the sad thing about Dr. Verwoerd's assassination is that it created the setting for irresponsible people to construct conspiracy stories, with this murder as the central theme."⁷¹⁰⁹ The purpose of examining some of these theories below, though it might appear a pointless exercise since none adduces any real evidence for their claims, is to put an end to all these theories, however obvious their general idiocy must be from the study anyway.

Setting aside the theories brainwashing, Dr. Bird and Hubbard, examined earlier in this chapter, one of the first published rejections of the official version of Dr. Verwoerd's assassination came in 1967 from Noel Crowd and Count Revo, in their book The Pattern of Assassination. The authors, clearly right-wing extremist Christians and anti-Semites, argued that Tsafendas was a trained assassin and part of a wider plot against South Africa. The only evidence they offered to support this claim was Dr. Fisher's opinion, and those of the unnamed doctors quoted by Dagbreek, that the wounds were inflicted by an expert knife handler. The authors appeared completely unaware of Tsafendas's statements to the police, of his political ideas or of his past political activism. Most of their book consisted of praise for Dr. Verwoerd and an anti-Semite tirade.

In order better to understand Revo's and Crowd's claim, it is important to know something about them, as well as the company which published their book. The authors were anti-Semite, anti-Communist, right-wing Christians who "specialised" during the 1960s in advancing "conspiracy theories" and authoring anti-Semitic hate books. Revo's titles included Chance or Conspiracy (1965) regarding Kennedy's assassination and a Jewish conspiracy, Internationalism (1965) about another alleged Jewish conspiracy, and Senator Kennedy: Sinister or Sincere (1968) yet one more anti-Semitic conspiracy. Crowd wrote the Pseudo-Liberals Strategy of War in 1964 and in 1965 the Persecution of South Africa, both anti-Semitic and anti-Communist tirades allegedly exposing alleged Jewish and Communist plots against South Africa.⁷¹¹⁰

⁷¹⁰⁹ Swanepoel, 2007: 66.

All of Revo's and Crowd's books, including The Pattern of Assassination, were published by Boomerang Publications, a publishing house in Pretoria which specialised in anti-Semitic hate literature with titles such as Hard Facts about the South African Jewish Times (1960) and South Africa - Heart & Soul: The Start of a Breakthrough (1965). Boomerang Publications propounded the belief that South Africa had been targeted by an international Jewish conspiracy whose ultimate aim was world domination. The company billed itself as the publishing representative of the Patriots Society for Race Friendship, which aimed to counter the alleged Jewish plan by study of the conspiracy.⁷¹¹¹ Crowd's and Revo's Jewish and "Red" theories found a significant measure of acceptance in South Africa at the time and even today some South Africans refer to their books to support their argument for a Jewish conspiracy.

It should be noted that The Pattern of Assassination was not the only book in 1967 which dealt with Verwoerd's assassination. Also in 1967, J.J.J. Stoltz, who was also Verwoerd's biographer, published Die Moord op Dr. Verwoerd, in which he seemed to accept most, if not all, of the Commission's findings and conclusions. Stoltz made reference to the brainwashing theory, as well as the Lomas issue and the "Is Verwoerd dead?" question at the Eleni. More than simply reporting the Commission's observations without challenging them, Stoltz sought to confirm the Commission's findings with his own analysis.

In subsequent years, books such as B.M. Schoeman's 1975 work, Die Sluipmoord op Dr. Verwoerd, and Jaap Marais's 1992 volume, Die Era van Verwoerd, questioned the claimed insanity of Tsafendas and the Commission's findings. Both books referred to incidents which they felt were "odd" or inadequately explained by the Commission, like Lomas and the Eleni. Marais wondered how the conversation about Verwoerd's death started in the Eleni since he found the Commission's explanation inadequate. However, Marais was unaware that the Commission, or the police, had suppressed the evidence about how the conversation started. Finally, both books also referred to the brainwashing theory and both authors, especially Schoeman, presented it as a real possibility.

⁷¹¹⁰ Blog Rare Books.co.uk.

⁷¹¹¹ Shimoni, 2003: 72.

Schoeman also claimed that Tsafendas was part of a wider Communist plot. He claimed that there was irrefutable evidence that Tsafendas was a member of M-Apparat, a secret Communist organization of seamen and officials of seamen's unions affiliated with the Russian Navy spy service. Schoeman claimed that this information was made available to him in 1969, three years after Verwoerd's assassination, by Patrick Walsh, research director of Canadian Intelligence Publications (CIP), who visited South Africa that year. Schoeman also claimed that the US Congress and the Committee on Un-American Activities had investigated the M-Apparat in 1963 (This was known as the Albany investigation).

Schoeman's book offered purported background on M-Apparat, highlighting the fact that some prominent members, like Tony Ambatelios and George Scordas, were Greek. He claimed that Tsafendas was a close friend of Constantine Poulos, another Greek and allegedly a leader of M-Apparat in Canada. He claimed that in the Canadian Intelligence Publications office in Ontario there was a complete file with extensive information about Tsafendas, including details of his "operations" in the United States, as well as articles from American and Canadian newspapers proving that Tsafendas was linked to M-Apparat. Finally, Schoeman speculated as to how M-Apparat members might have assisted Tsafendas in the United States and elsewhere.

Let us examine Schoeman's claims. Firstly, the author of this study examined every single copy of two of the biggest Canadian newspapers of the time, The Globe and Mail of Toronto and the Vancouver Sun, between September 6, 1966 and October 30, 1966. None of the information mentioned by Schoeman appears in either of these two newspapers. It could be argued that the information was published on another date or by another newspaper. However, the Canadian print media gave very little space to Tsafendas and there were no reports about him from three or four days after the assassination until his summary trial. What's more, if such a report had appeared in another paper, it would almost certainly have been picked up by the two biggest newspapers. Using services which provide access to the world press, the author examined everything that had been written about M-Apparat and Tsafendas and ascertained that not a single newspaper published any of the claims made by Schoeman. In fact, there is not a single mention in the available literature or on the internet of the M-Apparat being an active organization after 1935.

A cursory study reveals that Schoeman is wrong about some of his “facts,” which should have been easy to check. For example, the hearings of the Committee on Un-American Activities (the Albany investigation) took place in 1953 and not in 1963 as he claimed.⁷¹¹² Schoeman also wrote that three Greeks, Constantine Poulos, George Scordas and Tony Ambatielos,⁷¹¹³ were named during the Committee’s hearings as members of the organization. The fact is only Scordas was mentioned, named by Patrick Walsh. Importantly, several other members of the organization were named by Walsh, along with Communists who were active in the past in the USA. Tsafendas was not named. It seems unlikely, though not impossible, that Walsh forgot to mention Tsafendas, despite, according to Schoeman, filling a prominent role.

Let us now examine the man who claimed to have information about Tsafendas and M-Apparat. Patrick Walsh, a fanatical anti-Communist, was born in Quebec City, Canada, on March 17, 1916. In 1934, he spent a year in the novitiate of the Catholic order of missionaries, the White Fathers of Africa. During the Second World War, he served with the Canadian armed forces and participated in the Normandy landings in 1944. After the war, he spent four years “sailing on deep-sea ships all over the world.” Upon his return to Canada, he worked as undercover agent for the Special Branch (later renamed Security and Intelligence) of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP). According to Walsh, it was at “this stage that he began to realize the extent of Communist penetration in the trade-union movement” and he co-operated with the Provincial Police and the RCMP in “thwarting Communist violence in the Rouyn-Noranda area.” Walsh held positions in a large number of organisations, including President of the United Veterans Branch of the Canadian Legion, Provincial Command Officer of the Canadian Legion in Quebec, Research Director of the Canadian League of Rights and National Secretary of the Canadian Friends of Rhodesia. In ⁷¹¹² The full text of the hearings is available here:

https://archive.org/stream/investigationofc0102unit/investigationofc0102unit_djvu.txt

⁷¹¹³ Tony Ambatielos was a Greek seaman who emigrated to Great Britain in the 1930s and founded the Communist Federation of Greek Maritime Unions. After WWII, he returned to Greece, which was soon devastated by the Civil War. He was arrested in October 1947 and sentenced to death for his Communist and trade union activities, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. He spent the next seventeen years in prison before being released in 1964, only to be re-arrested three years later by the military dictatorship in Greece (Aaronovitch, 2016: 123-125). He could not have been active with M-Apparat or any similar organization while in prison because conditions for political prisoners in Greece were very harsh. Detainees were closely watched and allowed minimal outside contact, making it virtually impossible for them to participate in any form of political activity.

1967, he stated that he had “spent thirty years of his life fighting the Communist conspiracy.”⁷¹¹⁴

Regarding these organisations, the Canadian Friends of Rhodesia does not need explanation since the title says it all. The Canadian League of Rights was one of the most far-right, anti-Semitic and anti-Communist organizations in Canada, led by an infamous fascist and anti-Semite, Ron Gostick, who was also founder of Canadian Intelligence Publications.⁷¹¹⁵ Walsh’s membership of these two organizations pointed clearly to his political opinions.

Walsh’s written and spoken words make it clear that he was a dyed-in-the-wool anti-Communist who believed that Communism was conspiring to rule the world. In 1967, using Canadian Intelligence Publications and the Canadian Anti-Communist Secretariat, he published a pamphlet entitled RCMP Security and Intelligence Against Communism in Canada. The pamphlet is dedicated by Walsh “To Mrs. Anne Neill⁷¹¹⁶ of Australia, and Mr. Gerald Ludi of South Africa, former undercover agents who risked their lives in the line of duty in order to expose the International Communist Conspiracy.”⁷¹¹⁷

Ludi was an agent of the South African secret service who managed to infiltrate the South African Communist Party and secure the arrests of many anti-apartheid activists. His cover was blown when he was required to testify in the trial of Bram Fisher as a state witness. Ludi testified to his meetings and chats with Fisher, thus contributing to the latter’s conviction.⁷¹¹⁸ Walsh claimed that his pamphlet exposed the infiltration of Communists in the Canadian public sector.⁷¹¹⁹

The pamphlet concluded with a section headed “Postscript to the Australian Edition” in which Walsh wrote:

⁷¹¹⁴ Walsh, 1967: 2.

⁷¹¹⁵ In 1954 Godstick wrote The Architects Behind the World Communist Conspiracy and argued that there was, as the title suggests, a Communist conspiracy to take over the world.

⁷¹¹⁶ Neill was an Australian widow who was a member of the Liberal and Country League and of the Women’s Peace Council. She was later recruited by the Australian Security Intelligence Organisation to infiltrate the South Australian Peace Council and the Communist party of Australia. She was successful and even attended the Peace Congress in Vienna and visited Moscow (Horner (The Guardian), 7 October 2014, ‘Anne Neill: Australia’s first secret agent invited behind the iron curtain.’)

⁷¹¹⁷ Walsh, 1967: n.p.

⁷¹¹⁸ Clingman, 2013: 319-323, 371.

⁷¹¹⁹ Walsh, 1967: 1-8.

“The truth will out some day and when that day comes, some of you Aussies will recall the pamphlet SPOTLIGHT ON RED SPY RINGS and we in Canada will recall another pamphlet, THE ARCHITECTS BEHIND THE WORLD COMMUNIST CONSPIRACY, that DARED to tell the truth BEHIND the Soviet spy rings while most of the communications media ranted about ‘McCarthyism’ instead of telling the facts to their readers.”⁷¹²⁰

In the event, none of Walsh’s many conspiracy theories or prophecies came true because they were largely guesswork, supposition, wishful thinking or figments of his imagination.

As for Schoeman’s claims regarding M-Apparat, Walsh indeed spoke about this organization to the Committee of Un-American Activities. He described it as a “worldwide international organization of top Communist agitators aboard ships and among the dock workers.”⁷¹²¹ However, as far as the author can establish, M-Apparat was nothing like this. According to three eminent historians, Timothy S. Brown, Assistant Professor of History at Northeastern University, Boston, Mass., Eve Rosenhaft, Professor of German Historical Studies at the University of Liverpool, and James J. Ward, Professor of History at the Cedar Crest College, Allentown, Pennsylvania, the M[ilitary]-Apparat was formed by the Communist Party of Germany (KPD) in 1920 as part of an extensive illegal organization established after the Second Comintern Congress held that year. It was the KPD’s illegal, para-military wing set up to defend Communists from the violence of paramilitary organizations in Germany, but also to prepare its members for a possible armed uprising. Technical assistance from Moscow gave M-Apparat additional muscle but the organisation was cut back in 1923. In 1928-1929 the name was changed to A[nti]-M[ilitary]-Apparat, and it was dissolved in 1935.⁷¹²²

Schoeman in his book offers a completely different account of the M-Apparat, about how it was created, how it operated and its aims and goals. None of the three historians named above mentions anything like this, suggesting that Schoeman got his facts wrong or knew things the historians missed. The author has researched this subject extensively and has not been able to find any reference to M-Apparat being active since 1935, apart from Walsh’s theory. Professor James J. Ward told the author, “I think it unlikely that the Apparat would have been reconstituted during WW II, although a handful of former members may have participated in the establishment of the SED in the Soviet occupation zone in the first post-war years.”⁷¹²³ It seems rather unlikely that the organization was indeed active but only Walsh knew about it. Consideration of his other theories and far-fetched claims suggest this to be a very unlikely possibility.

⁷¹²⁰ Walsh, 1967: 1-8.

⁷¹²¹ https://archive.org/stream/investigationofc0102unit/investigationofc0102unit_djvu.txt

⁷¹²² Brown, 2016; Rosenhaft, 2009; Ward, 1984: 257-297.

As for Tsafendas, even if the organization did exist during WWII and in the 1960s, that does not mean he was a member. Tsafendas spoke at length and in great detail about his life to the Orthodox priests who visited him regularly in prison and in hospital. He had no problem telling them about joining the Communists of the DSE during the Greek Civil War and even spying on their behalf. Thus, it seems most unlikely that he revealed these and many other unknown aspects of his life but kept membership of M-Apparat secret. The author asked all the Communist sailors of the Eleni whether they were members of the M-Apparat or any Communist organization and they all strongly denied it. None of them had heard the name M-Apparat and could not even pronounce it. They pointed out that Communism and the Communist Party were illegal at the time in Greece and it was a serious offence to be a member of any Communist organization.

What makes Schoeman’s claim regarding Tsafendas and the M-Apparat almost impossible of belief is Walsh himself and Canadian Intelligence Publications. Both seem to contradict Schoeman’s claim that the company had a complete file on Tsafendas with his activities in the United States and Canada. Walsh wrote, co-wrote, or contributed forewords to several books about Communist conspiracies, all published by the Canadian Intelligence Publications, where he was the research director.

The publishing house did in Canada what Boomerang Publications did in South Africa. It published and distributed far-right, right-wing-Christian, anti-Semitic and anti-Communist hate literature, much of which warned of a Jewish-Communist conspiracy to take over the world. The company’s titles included The Architects Behind the World Communist Conspiracy; The Red Fog Over America; Hidden Government; No Wonder We Are Losing; The Yalta Betrayal; Zion’s Fifth Column; The Real Communist Menace: The Canadian Royal Commission’s Report on Espionage and Other Communist Activities in Canada; Student Power Movement & What is Behind it World Wide; The Battle for Canada; Canada’s ⁷¹²³ Professor James J. Ward in a personal interview, 6 November 2017.

Watergate: The Story of Treason in Ottawa; The Moment of Truth; The World Council of Churches: - A Soviet-Marxist Catspaw in Africa?; Harvest of Fear, A Diary of Terrorist Atrocities in Rhodesia. However, in none of these books is there any mention of Tsafendas. If the company really had a file on him, it would almost certainly have published it to support its claims of the Communist conspiracy since Tsafendas was indeed a Communist and had just assassinated South Africa's Prime Minister.

The briefest glance at some of the conspiracy theories in these books is enough to convince the serious reader that they cannot be taken seriously. For example, in The Moment of Truth, The World Council of Churches: A Soviet-Marxist Catspaw in Africa? Ron Gostick repeated his claim of a Communist conspiracy to enslave the world. What was different about this pamphlet was Gostick's discovery of a new enemy, the World Council of Churches, which he claimed was a tool in the hands of the Soviets. He described the WCC as "little more than the ecclesiastical arm of the International Communist Conspiracy," which wanted to make all of Africa Communist. After Africa, it would be the turn of the rest of the world.⁷¹²⁴

Gostick claimed that the WCC supported and funded "the most barbaric guerrilla-terrorist activities in Southern Africa, which have caused untold suffering and the death of thousands — mostly Blacks — including many children and our own Christian missionaries. This anti-Christian action of the WCC has become so outrageous that it is offensive to some of its own more fundamentalist or evangelical members. Yet, only last month, in addition to the $85,000 the WCC recently gave the Red-controlled guerrillas attacking Rhodesia, a further $125,000 was allocated to SWAPO terrorists operating as the Soviets' catspaw in South West Africa." He warned that "until Canadians in general, and the Christian Laity in particular, wake up and face the reality of this incredible betrayal, this policy of national suicide will continue. Therefore, this little booklet is a most timely addition to the Freedom arsenal."⁷¹²⁵

At the end of The Architects Behind the World Communist Conspiracy, Gostick wrote:

"Nothing less than a Christian reawakening and a return to Moral Law can lay the basis of sound action to overcome this Anti-Ghrist onslaught upon Christendom. We of the ⁷¹²⁴ Gostick, 1978: 1-8.

⁷¹²⁵ Gostick, 1978: 1-2.

West must begin to face up to the Truth, ugly though it may be. Anything less will spell disaster. May Almighty God, through His Holy Spirit, awaken, guide and direct His people in the salvaging and revitalizing of Christian Civilization. International Marxism is a Conspiracy. The quickest way to defeat a Conspiracy is to expose it to the light.”

Gostick then pleaded “after you have read this revelation of treason and subversion, send copies to friends, public officials and influential citizens throughout your community and province. Don’t break the chain – keep the revelation growing.”⁷¹²⁶

It is obvious from the above and from other publications by the same company that their aim was to spread the word about this alleged Communist conspiracy. Tsafendas, a Communist who assassinated a powerful world leader and who was allegedly a member of M-Apparat, would clearly have been an ideal figurehead for such a campaign. Yet Tsafendas receives no mention from the Canadian Intelligence Publications that according to Schoeman the company had a detailed file on him in its offices. It appears almost impossible that the company had a large file on Tsafendas and kept it to itself. Furthermore, if it did have such information, Walsh and the CIP would surely have alerted the South African authorities. After all, it was clear from Walsh’s dedication to Ludi and his membership of the Canadian Friends of Rhodesia group that he supported apartheid. Thus, if he had such information, it seems unlikely that he kept it to himself and Schoeman.

Despite the many egregious inaccuracies in Schoeman’s book, there are always people eager to believe in conspiracy theories and one, in this case, was Jaap A. Marais. In his book in 1992, Marais referred to the rumour about Tsafendas and M-Apparat.⁷¹²⁷ Without checking, Marais lifted the claim directly from Schoeman and almost copy-pasted it into his own book. That is evident from the fact that he makes exactly the same mistake as Schoeman in claiming that the Albany Investigation took place in 1963, when in reality, it was in 1953. Finally, in his 1980 book Die Geldmag. SA se Onsigbare Regering, Schoeman returned with another conspiracy theory and claimed that Dr. Verwoerd’s assassination, by the “Communist Tsafendas” was a key moment in the planning of the great internal and external financial powers to gain control of the South African economy.⁷¹²⁸

⁷¹²⁶ Gostick, 1954: 16.

⁷¹²⁷ Marais, 1992: 200-212.

⁷¹²⁸ Schoeman, 1980: 46.

It is worthy of note that in 1974, although he did not mention anything about Tsafendas, British journalist and political analyst Douglas Reed wrote in The Siege of Southern Africa that Poqo had sent out “an organized group” to kill Dr. Verwoerd, Vorster and Dongses. Reed claimed that the plan failed when the group was intercepted by the police.⁷¹²⁹ Significantly, Reed was also a well-known conspiracist and a fanatical anti-Semite who also believed the Jews were planning to take over the world.⁷¹³⁰

In later years, with the arrival of the internet, more conspiracy theories came to light, one being that Tsafendas was a hired assassin, another that he was trained by MI6, while the Jewish, the Communist and the brainwashing theories remained prominent. A conspiracy theory which surprisingly found some appeal among white South Africans was put forward by Advocate P.J. Pretorius in his 1996 book Volksverraad: Die Geskiedenis agter die Geskiedenis (self-published in English the following year as Sell-Out: The Truth Behind the History of South African Politics). It carries the following blurb:

“For the first time, the White South Africans heard the truth about how they had been manipulated and brainwashed into giving their country to black Communist rulers. The handing over of the government to black rule had been carefully planned over many decades with the help of traitors among the Afrikaners. These traitors had been working hard behind the scenes, telling their people one thing, but doing and planning quite another. In this shocking book, Advocate P J Pretorius unmasks them all, calls them by their names and tells of their crimes against the unsuspecting Afrikaner nation. He names their accomplices among the CIA, as well as those in the NIS [National Intelligence Service] of South Africa. He leaves no stone unturned to get at the damning truth.”⁷¹³¹

Advocate Pretorius, a self-professed former NIS agent, claimed that the Verwoerd assassination was orchestrated by the Illuminati and Anton Rupert, while Happy Oppenheimer is described as the Illuminatie’s “kingpin” in South Africa.⁷¹³² Pretorius also claimed that Tsafendas was trained by Britain’s MI6 to assassinate Dr. Verwoerd and that he was paid R5,000 in cash. The inaccuracies in Pretorius’s book are so many and so obvious, it is difficult to know where to begin, therefore we will examine only some of those errors which pertain to Tsafendas.

⁷¹²⁹ Reed, 1974: 111.

⁷¹³⁰ Thurlow, 1984: 23-34.

⁷¹³¹ Pretorius, 1997: back cover.

⁷¹³² Pretorius, 1997: 133, 170-175.

According to Pretorius:

“Tsafendas in May 1960 told workers at Anton Rupert’s cigarette factory at Brits, Rothmans International, that he would kill Dr. Verwoerd should such an occasion arise. Tsafendas’ statement was relayed to Dr. Rupert shortly afterwards. Tsafendas was employed at Rothmans International in June 1960, and his employment was terminated formally in January 1962. Rupert never spoke to Tsafendas face to face. From February 1962, Tsafendas was unemployed but was paid from Rupert’s financial sources. It is said that the idea to murder Dr. Verwoerd first took shape in March 1963 in the vicinity of Birmingham. Rupert called a meeting with four other persons, among them members of the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR), CIA and MI6. At that meeting it was resolved that Dr. Verwoerd was to be killed by an assassin, and Tsafendas was called in to do the deed. It was decided that Tsafendas would be trained by MI6, and that they would pay him once the deed was done...

Tsafendas’s training by MI6 was done in two stages. The first stage was conducted in the vicinity of Kerkira in Greece, and rested mainly on hypnotic brainwashing. The spear was used as symbol to activate the murder. A drop of blood signified the time factor. When and where the second stage was conducted is not known. The emphasis during this stage was on the handling of weapons. In Cape Town on 9 June 1965 at about 21h30 Tsafendas was paid about R 5,000 in cash to murder Dr. Verwoerd. He was paid by an unidentified MI6 agent. As far as is known, he was transported in Rupert’s car. Rupert himself was not present, but his chauffeur was. The chauffeur was not aware of the nature of the event.”⁷¹³³ Pretorius concluded that, “Although Rupert was the driving force behind Dr. Verwoerd’s murder, the architect was the foreign Monetary Power.”⁷¹³⁴

Pretorius does not name sources for any of the above claims; instead, he asks the reader to take his word for granted, as he states at the beginning of his book: “I, the writer, stand by the contents of this book. I will only go back on my word if those who allege that this information is false, are willing to prove it through a serum test.”⁷¹³⁵

Let us examine some of the claims involving Tsafendas. Firstly, Tsafendas never worked for Rothmans. There is no such information in the PIDE file, in the COE’s report, nor in the evidence collected by the South African police, including that provided by the British ⁷¹³³ Pretorius, 1997: 170-174.

⁷¹³⁴ Pretorius, 1997: 175.

⁷¹³⁵ Pretorius, 1997: n.p.

authorities regarding Tsafendas's time in England. Tsafendas himself never told anyone that he had worked for Rothmans and it is worth mentioning that he personally abhorred smoking and would move away from cigarette smokers to avoid the fumes.⁷¹³⁶

What is incontestable is that in June 1960, Tsafendas was working, not for Rothmans in England, but at a tractor factory in Munich, Germany. Tsafendas stated as much in his statement to the South African police after his arrest and the PIDE file on him confirmed it, noting that on May 25, 1960, he was issued a temporary Portuguese passport in Munich. On June 30, according to several PIDE documents, according to Tsafendas himself and according to the Commission of Enquiry, Tsafendas began travelling through the Balkans to Egypt in an attempt to reach Mozambique by land. In Egypt, his passport expired and the Portuguese Consulate refused to renew it. However, he managed to obtain a refugee passport from the Red Cross and travelled to Beirut, Lebanon.⁷¹³⁷

On January 20, 1961, Tsafendas presented himself at the Consulate-General of Spain in Jerusalem, requesting a visa for Israel as a refugee.⁷¹³⁸ In June/July 1961, he found himself in Istanbul, where he remained until December 1961. Unless, PIDE, the Commission of Enquiry, the South African press, Tsafendas himself in his statements to the police and his friends, Father Nikola Banovic and Alexandra Vaporidis are all mistaken, these were Tsafendas's whereabouts, rendering Pretorius's statements false. Tsafendas lived for some seven months in Istanbul, four of them in Father Banovic's house where the two were in touch on a daily basis. Another witness, Alexandra Vaporidis, whose husband Father Agathagelos Vaporidis also associated with Tsafendas at the time, confirmed to the author that Tsafendas was in Istanbul at the time. Even the South African press had become aware that Tsafendas was in Istanbul in 1961 teaching English at a private college

As for Tsafendas's whereabouts in January 1962, these were also known to PIDE and to the South African authorities. According to Tsafendas's statement to the police, but also to PIDE's file, he was at that time in Crete. He then took a ferry to Piraeus, travelled by bus and ferry to Corfu, then boarded a seagoing ferry to Brindisi in southern Italy.⁷¹³⁹ He arrived in ⁷¹³⁶ Fotini Gavasiadis in a personal interview, 6 May 2015; Irene Michaletos in a personal interview, 16 April 2016.

⁷¹³⁷ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷¹³⁸ Report of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, proc. 518/15/55. Co. 334. 6 April 1961. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷¹³⁹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

Brindisi, on January 31, 1962 and travelled to Rome, where on February 8, 1962, he called at the Portuguese Embassy. The embassy gave him an allowance of 6,000 lire and a Rome-Lisbon train ticket costing 26,000 lire to help him return to Portugal.⁷¹⁴⁰ It is surely not possible that all these sources, especially PIDE's official documents from the Portuguese mission in Italy, could be mistaken about Tsafendas's whereabouts while Pretorius is correct, without providing a single piece of evidence to support his claim.

As for Tsafendas receiving a payment on June 9, 1965 in Cape Town, this could not have happened because Tsafendas was in Durban at the time. On May 7, 1965, Tsafendas was embroiled in a fight with Vergos in Mandini, a town about a hundred kilometres north of Durban.⁷¹⁴¹ Father Hanno Probst testified to the police that sometime in June he saw Tsafendas in Mandini with his hand bandaged from the fight with Vergos.⁷¹⁴² That must have been early June, as later that month Tsafendas moved back to Durban and from June 21, 1965 to August 24, 1965, he lived at the Durban Men's Home at 160 Queen Street. Two staff members of the Home, Kenneth Heugh Ross and Robert Harpur Smith, testified to the police after they checked their records that Tsafendas was there at the time.⁷¹⁴³ It was also in June 1965, while he was in Durban, that Tsafendas received the first letter from Helen Daniels in Cape Town. They subsequently exchanged more letters.⁷¹⁴⁴ According to Tsafendas himself, to Helen Daniels's statement to the police and to her brother Peter Daniels's testimony at Tsafendas's summary trial, Tsafendas arrived in Cape Town from Durban on August 28, 1965, travelling partly by train and partly hitch-hiking.⁷¹⁴⁵

It seems highly unlikely that these three people are mistaken about the date of Tsafendas's arrival while Pretorius is correct, again without evidence. It is not impossible that ⁷¹⁴⁰ Seccao Consular Report regarding Dimitri Tsafendas, 10 February 1962. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷¹⁴¹ Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA; Johannes Jacobus Botha statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File Verklarings. NASA.

⁷¹⁴² Father Hanno Probst statement to the police, 9 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA; Father Hanno Probst statement to the COE, 13 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁷¹⁴³ Kenneth Heugh Ross statement to the police, 7 September 1966, K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA; Robert Harpur Smith statement to the police, 7 September 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas. NASA.

⁷¹⁴⁴ Helen Dorothy Daniels statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, NASA.

⁷¹⁴⁵ Helen Dorothy Daniels statement to the police, 15 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: VDSO 17/64, NASA; Peter Daniels's testimony on Tsafendas's summary trial, 18 October 1966. K150, Vol. 10, File: Trial, NASA; Demetrio Tsafendas statement to Major Rossouw. 11 September 1966. K150, Vol. 1, File: Verklaring van Demetrio Tsafendas. NASA.

Tsafendas could have travelled for one day from Durban to Cape Town, received the money from the MI6 agent and then returned to Durban. In such a case, however, why would he not stay in Cape Town to do the job? A final point: Tsafendas's financial situation was so bad at the time that he hitch-hiked free to Cape Town. Why would he go to all that trouble when he had in his possession the money the agent supposedly gave him?

Pretorius's book contains several other unfounded claims both about Tsafendas and historical events in South Africa, but the author feels it is not necessary to examine them since it is clear that they have no basis in truth and are not worth taking seriously. Petrus Cornelius Swanepoel referred explicitly to Pretorius as being one of those "irresponsible people" who constructed conspiracy theories. He wrote that his claims "are completely unfounded. His nameless sources are non-existent and the entire book, which refers to the 'Illuminati' on just about every page, is constructed on a falsehood. He claims the proof of the existence of the 'Illuminati' is to be found in Professor Carroll Quigley's book Tragedy and Hope. The truth, of course, is that the word 'Illuminati' appears nowhere in that book."⁷¹⁴⁶

Conspiracy theories as to Verwoerd's assassination continued to appear in later years, especially on the world wide web when that became available, but also occasionally in books. The most popular theory, as always, was of a Jewish and/or Communist conspiracy. What may have added to this belief was the fact that four members of Tsafendas's defence team were Jewish (Bloomberg, Kossev, Sakinofsky and Zabow) as was Dr Jacobson, a fact highlighted by Dr. Bird's theory. Many of the theories developed in later years took elements from the older ones or simply re-presented them as facts because Schoeman or Marais wrote about them. It is pointless to continue analysing these writings since none of them provides any supporting evidence. Worse, the authors prove not to have even the most basic knowledge of Tsafendas's life, political ideas or political actions before the assassination.

Ironically, none of the conspiracy advocates seemed to be aware that Tsafendas's great-grandmother was Jewish, although this would doubtless have been seen as further evidence of a complicated Judaic plot. Many similar theories purporting to explain the "truth" behind Verwoerd's assassination can be found on the internet, including several based on Dr. Bird's theory or on Dagbreek's report from the unnamed doctors. None of them is worthy of serious examination since they provide no credible proof for their claims. They either speculate endlessly about what possibly happened, or they refer to “events” and present them as facts, while no names or references are adduced as to the source of their “information.” Finally, none of the authors demonstrates even the slightest knowledge of Tsafendas’s life, character, political beliefs and activities apart from the information published in the van Wyk Commission’s report.

⁷¹⁴⁶ Swanepoel, 2007: 67.

It can be no coincidence that most of the conspiracy theories regarding Tsafendas were developed by people with the same political obsessions and characteristics, being racists, fascists, anti-Semites and anti-Communists. All claim that there was a Jewish-Communist conspiracy against Dr. Verwoerd and South Africa. Where they differ is with the assassin, some claiming Tsafendas was brainwashed, others that he was a member of a secret Communist organization, still others that he was a hired hand. Something else they have in common, and the most important, is that none of them presents any evidence to support his theory and sources are never specified. As for the Jews being blamed, that is hardly surprising. As Jean-Paul Sartre said, “If the Jew did not exist, the anti-Semite would invent him.”⁷¹⁴⁷

⁷¹⁴⁷ Sartre, J.P. (1946) Anti-Semite and Jew.

SUMMARY OF THE COMMISSION'S REPORT

The report of the Commission played a very important role in creating the false picture of Tsafendas that persists until today. The stated duty of the Commission was "to enquire into and submit a report on all aspects relating to the death of the Prime Minister which were deemed to be in the public interest." Anyone reading the Commission's Report without specialist knowledge would probably consider it lucid, informative and even-handed. On most issues, it is also in accordance with what was heard during Tsafendas's summary trial.

However, anyone cognisant of the evidence which the police and the Commission had in their possession, would conclude that van Wyk's Report was no better, no fairer and no more accurate than Sharpeville or the other Inquiries discussed at the beginning of this chapter. In truth, it was worse because of the sheer amount of information it suppressed in order to portray Tsafendas's personality and intentions in a negative light. As with several judicial inquiries, the van Wyk Commission concealed more than it revealed. Although the picture of Tsafendas contained in the Report was certainly more accurate than the one which emerged from his trial, it was nevertheless a travesty of the truth.

The Commission seemed to believe that apart from the stated official reasons of its existence, it also had the following duties:

- To confirm that Tsafendas had acted alone.
- To strengthen and confirm the notion that Tsafendas was mad and devoid of political motive.
- To belittle Tsafendas in such a way that the public would agree with the portrayal it had engineered.
- To absolve the police and the security forces of blame for letting Tsafendas get close to Dr. Verwoerd.

To achieve these aims, the Commission covered up any contrary evidence.

TSAFENDAS'S POLITICAL ACTIVITIES AND IDEOLOGY

The Commission appears to be open and objective in disclosing some of Tsafendas's political activities. It reports that he was a one-time member of the SACP, that he was engaged in Communist propaganda in Mozambique and South Africa and that he had strong feelings against the Portuguese colonial rulers and the South African government. All this is correct, but merely skims the surface of Tsafendas's political involvements.

The Commission omits major facts, such as his association in London with leading anti-apartheid activists, the fact that he fought with the Communists in the Greek Civil War, his opinion about Dr. Verwoerd, and several of his arrests and prison sentences by the Portuguese because of his political activities. Furthermore, the Commission offers no new revelations since most of Tsafendas's political activities, for example that he was a former member of the SACP, had already been reported by the Press. Some revelations could probably not have remained hidden, e.g. that the police held four files on Tsafendas and not just one as originally stated, while others come across as attempts to show some objectivity so as to conceal more important facts.

It is noticeable that evidence available to the Commission revealing Tsafendas to be a politically involved person, a devoted and passionate Communist with a fully developed ideology is not the evidence which the Commission presents. The Commission downplays his political ideas and omits details of his activities. The extent of Tsafendas's desire to effect a change in South Africa's race policy is suppressed. Crucially missing, for instance, are that he wanted "to create a resistance to the regime of South Africa and mentioned civil disobedience" and his willingness to do "anything that would get the South African regime out of power,"⁷¹⁴⁸ and that he wanted to see a "Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they white or black, and therefore separated from the Mother nation."⁷¹⁴⁹ Most importantly, the Commission avoided using Tsafendas's own words to describe his political ideology, apparently because, honest, persuasive and coherent as they were, they did not fit with the idea of a madman.

TSAFENDAS'S PERSONALITY

The Commission's determinedly negative portrayal of Tsafendas could be fairly described as character assassination. It ignores any positive evidence about him, apart from one, whilst embracing everything it can find to his detriment. Some 200 witnesses were interviewed by the police and the Commission, of whom 44 made positive statements about Tsafendas's character, 6 made negative statements and the remainder said nothing negative or positive. Thus, 22% of the statements were positive, 3% were negative and the remaining 75% neutral. However, the Commission used only 1 of the 44 positive comments, that is only 2.2% of the positive comments but 100% of the negative. It also presented some incidents in such a way as to give the wrong idea about the incident and about Tsafendas.

⁷¹⁴⁸ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁷¹⁴⁹ Vertaling. Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. K150. Vol: 6, File: 3. NASA; PIDE report: Information: Demitrio Tsafendas or Demetrio Tsafandakis. 7 September 1966. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

Judge van Wyk used a series of unfounded characterisations to portray Tsafendas which were incompatible with the evidence collected by the Commission and the police. It did this by suppressing and misrepresenting evidence in order to reduce Tsafendas to a shambling caricature of the person he truly was. If van Wyk were alive today, he would have great difficulty defending himself against a charge of defamation.

TSAFENDAS'S MOTIVE

A glaring loophole in the Commission's work is its failure to provide an explanation for Tsafendas's motive for the assassination. Although Tsafendas had made it perfectly clear to the police in his two statements that he killed Dr. Verwoerd because he considered him to be a dictator and hoped his death would change national policy, these comments about motivation are omitted. Instead, the Commission speculates fruitlessly about Tsafendas's reasoning and what might have triggered his hand.

More importantly, in the chapter of the Report titled "Demetrio Tsafendas's Motives," the Commission dedicates most of the space to presenting Tsafendas as a rejected, frustrated, psychologically damaged product of an unhappy childhood, employing a series of wholly unfounded descriptions of him that were irrelevant to the question of motive. One area where the Commission distanced itself from the summary trial was in making no reference to the tapeworm story when discussing motives for the assassination. Once again, the Commission avoided using Tsafendas's own words to describe his motive, clearly because such an explanation did not fit with the idea of a madman.

TSAFENDAS'S MENTAL STATE

The Report seems to suggest that the Commission has some doubts as to the extent of Tsafendas's alleged insanity. It concedes that he was not as mad as portrayed at his trial and that he was clever enough to put on a good act. Still, it goes to great pains to press its case for insanity. For instance, only 4 witnesses out of a total of about 200 questioned by the police and the Commission thought there was something mentally wrong with Tsafendas; that is 2% of the total. Using 3 of these 4 means the Commission used 75% of the negative statements. On the other hand, 51 witnesses out of the 200, this is the 25.5%, had commented that Tsafendas was perfectly normal, while the rest made no comment, obviously because Tsafendas seemed perfectly normal to them. However, the Commission only used 6 out of the 51 positive statements, thus only 11.7% of them. This is something that happened with every issue dealt by the Commission. All, or the vast majority of negative statements, are used, while the positive ones are ignored.

TSAFENDAS FAKING MENTAL ILLNESS

One very important revelation made by the Commission is that Tsafendas had faked mental illness while in the United States. This was a genuine disclosure since it was not brought up at the trial and had not been mentioned elsewhere. However, the incident is treated superficially and no elaboration is offered, while the Commission suppressed the fact that there was at least one other time when Tsafendas faked mental illness - when he pretended to be mad in order to not serve in the Portuguese army.

THE ELENI

One of the most intriguing parts of the Report concerned what happened on board the tanker Eleni and how it was that Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed there three days before he actually died. The Commission dedicated more space to this than to any other issue but failed to find an answer and in the end only speculated about what might have happened. Judge van Wyk could have saved himself much effort by using the evidence painstakingly collected by the South African police in Venice. They showed precisely what happened and the circumstances in which Dr. Verwoerd's death was discussed when Tsafendas characterised a hypothetical assassination of his as justifiable because he was a tyrant who was oppressing his people. This was not the only important omission concerning the Eleni. Also suppressed were the fact that Tsafendas took some of the crew to visit a township, and the details of his initial assassination plan, to shoot Dr. Verwoerd and escape by hiding and then sailing away on the Eleni.

CONCLUSION

Austin T. Turk, Professor of Criminology at the University of California, said about South Africa during apartheid that it may well have had “the world’s most elaborate legal structure for the repression of political resistance of all kinds.”⁷¹⁵⁰ The van Wyk Commission and how it operated, as well as Tsafendas’s summary trial, are perfect examples of how right he was. As with so many Commissions of Inquiry during apartheid, the van Wyk inquiry concealed more than it revealed; it suppressed all the evidence which contradicted the verdict at Tsafendas’s summary trial and the picture of him which was presented to the court. Crucially, it sat on key evidence showing Tsafendas as a politically motivated person who killed Dr. Verwoerd because he considered him to be exactly what he was, a tyrant and a dictator and the brains behind apartheid, and further hoped that by killing him a change of policy would take place.

The primary aim of the Report was to dispel any suggestion that the assassination might have been part of a wider plot and that there might be serious political opposition to the apartheid regime, and it did this by presenting Tsafendas as a wandering lunatic who killed Dr. Verwoerd for no reason. By suppressing a great deal of evidence and massaging some that was presented, the Commission reassured the public and ensure there ensured and there would be no sympathy for Tsafendas and therefore no unfortunate reactions to his fate.

The Attorney-General at Tsafendas’s summary trial might not have had access to all the evidence gathered by the police and Judge Beyers himself was not even aware of it, but the same cannot be said about Judge van Wyk. He was in possession of a wealth of evidence making clear that Tsafendas was not as described at the summary trial. Nevertheless, he deliberately omitted much of it to present the distorted picture of Tsafendas that he required.

Professor John Dugard told the author about the portrayal of Tsafendas by van Wyk: “van Wyk was politically very much in favour of the government, so it would not surprise me at all that van Wyk decided either under pressure, but I suspect not under pressure, probably he just felt... and he was in touch with all the top National Party people, socially. He would probably have got the message that it was better, as far as the government was concerned, that Tsafendas be found to be insane. Politically, it was obviously better for the government to portray Tsafendas as someone who was insane, because they wished to be able to argue that no sane person could kill Dr. Verwoerd – that anyone who killed Dr. Verwoerd must have been insane. So that was why I suspect that Judge van Wyk interpreted the evidence the way he did.”⁷¹⁵¹

⁷¹⁵⁰ Turk, 1982: 146.

Furthermore, Professor Dugard believes it is inconceivable that van Wyk would have contradicted Judge Beyers' verdict under any circumstances, even if he had evidence pointing in an opposite direction. It would have been impossible for him to present Tsafendas and the assassination in a way that did not suit the government. That is exactly why he was chosen in the first place. On the subject of Commissions of Inquiry during the apartheid years, Professor Dugard said, “One of the most disgraceful things about South Africa during this period was the way in which judicial commissions were manipulated, and also the way in which inquest inquiries were conducted and the magistrates just ignored the evidence. (The judges) knew how to make a finding that would help the government. That was very clear.”⁷¹⁵² The way the Commission of Enquiry into Dr. Verwoerd's death was conducted is a perfect example of Professor Dugard's argument. It takes its place of dishonour alongside Sharpeville, Soweto, Langa and other disgraced apartheid Commissions.

⁷¹⁵¹ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 7 February 2016.

⁷¹⁵² Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 7 February 2016.

CHAPTER SEVEN

DAVID PRATT

INTRODUCTION

The aims of this chapter are to examine David Pratt's assault⁷¹⁵³ on Dr. Hendrik Verwoerd in 1960 and to bring to light important new information. Pratt's case is not examined in the same detail as that of Tsafendas, but by presenting the new evidence and considering similarities in the two cases, an argument is offered for a thorough reconsideration of Pratt's case. To examine Pratt's background, personality and beliefs in the context of his attack on Dr. Verwoerd and to support his case, the author used an extensive range of sources, including all relevant documents from the South African National Archives, interviews with people who knew Pratt, the archives of the National Liberal Club in London of which Pratt was a member for more than thirty years, Guy Spiller's film documentary about Pratt, The Liberal and the Pirate, Pratt's personal correspondence after the assault, and leading South African, European and American newspapers of the time. Examination of these sources brought to light several hitherto unknown but significant facts about Pratt, which suggest that a detailed re-evaluation of his case is necessary.

⁷¹⁵³ The study uses the word assault because Pratt said he wanted to injure Verwoerd, not to kill him.

DAVID PRATT'S BIOGRAPHY⁷¹⁵⁴

David Beresford Pratt seemed born to succeed, defying life-long epileptic seizures to excel in the academic world, in sports and in business, earning in the process a reputation as a kindly and principled man. He was described by fellow members of the National Liberal Club in London as “a gentleman in every way.”⁷¹⁵⁵ Pratt had a comfortable start in life, born October 1, 1909 in the “stockbroker belt” of Croydon, Surrey, outside London, to Arthur and Georgina Pratt. His father was a stockbroker and a wealthy businessman in his own right as the owner of several companies. He was also a committed Liberal and a prominent member of the Liberal Party of Great Britain. The family moved to South Africa when David was four and he grew up in Johannesburg.⁷¹⁵⁶ At the age of eight, he became subject to epileptic seizures and these affected him for the rest of his life.⁷¹⁵⁷

Pratt was not tall - five feet eight inches (1.73m) – but he was of solid build⁷¹⁵⁸ and was described by people who knew him as “gentle” and “kind.” Indeed, friends and acquaintances overflowed with compliments: he was “cultivated,” “courteous,” “amiable,” “good-looking,” “charming,” “very good-hearted,” “the perfect gentleman with perfect manners,” and “a man of principle” whose personality made him stand out in any gathering. “Friendly” and “compassionate,” he helped those in need, both white and non-white, as well as old people whether they were English- or Afrikaans-speaking.⁷¹⁵⁹

Like his father before him, Pratt became a member of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society; that was in 1925 and he remained a member until his arrest for the assault on Dr. Verwoerd. His father donated the Arthur Pratt Memorial Trophy to the Society, whose ⁷¹⁵⁴ Pratt's biography is quite brief, but more about his life will be revealed later in this chapter.

⁷¹⁵⁵ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'

⁷¹⁵⁶ Arthur Pratt's letter to the secretary of the National Liberal Club, 17 August 1927. National Liberal Club Archives (hereafter cited as NLCA); The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, 'no title'; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'

⁷¹⁵⁷ Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷¹⁵⁸ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'

⁷¹⁵⁹ Daily Dispatch, 13 April 1960: 1, 'The estranged Mrs. Pratt.'; Daily Express, 11 April 1960: 1, 'The gunman'; News Chronicle, 11 April 1960: 1, 'Would-be assassin: gunman without a cause'; Guy Spiller's 'The Liberal and the Pirate.' 1999.; The Cape Times, 11 April 1960, 'Strange whims of man held after the shooting.'; The New York Times, 11 April 1960, 'Pratt described as 'generous.'; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.' Rand Daily Mail, 11 April 1960: 1, 'The enigma that is Pratt'; The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 30, 'The lesson of South Africa.'; The Star, 11 April 1960: 1, 'Pratt confided worries to Rector, who respects trust'; TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, 'The assassin of Milner Park.'

members once declared that “all the Englishness of the Society was emphasized in the person of (David) Pratt.”⁷¹⁶⁰

Despite his epilepsy, Pratt excelled academically at the King Edward VII School in Johannesburg. He also proved himself a marksman on the shooting range.⁷¹⁶¹ In 1927, he returned to England and studied at Phillip Hope's establishment Craighurst, Southwold, Suffolk. He was then accepted at Caius College, Cambridge University.⁷¹⁶² There, he demonstrated an extraordinary intellectual range by graduating with a Bachelor's degree in Arts (Hons.), then qualifying as a chartered accountant. He became a Cambridge Blue, extending his sporting prowess to rowing as a member of the university team.⁷¹⁶³

On October 1, 1927, the day he turned eighteen, Pratt applied for membership of the National Liberal Club (NLC) in London. Anyone seeking membership of the NLC was assumed to be interested in politics and of a liberal persuasion. In his application, Pratt declared that he was “a Liberal in politics.”⁷¹⁶⁴ His father, who had been a prominent member of the Club for many years, addressed a letter to the Club Secretary supporting his son's application. He wrote that “although his political views are not at the moment very strongly developed, he shows every indication of following in his father's footsteps and will, I am sure, make a very staunch Liberal.”⁷¹⁶⁵ Pratt's application for membership was supported by W. T. Lambourn, a member of the Club since 1898, and he was duly accepted as a member.⁷¹⁶⁶ The young Pratt thus added his name to a roll of members which included such historic figures as Winston Churchill, David Lloyd George, G.K. Chesterton, George Bernard Shaw, Bram Stoker, Dylan Thomas and H.G. Wells.⁷¹⁶⁷ Whenever he was in England, Pratt would use the storied NLC as his second home.⁷¹⁶⁸

⁷¹⁶⁰ Gutsche, 1970: 156, 201; Rand Daily Mail, 11 April 1960: 2, ‘Pratt was seen near the Premier.’

⁷¹⁶¹ Die Vaderland, 11 April 1960: 4, ‘Pratt was soms gesellig, soms neuroties en onvriendelik’; Rand Daily Mail, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘The enigma that is Pratt’; Guy Spiller, 1999, The Liberal and the Pirate; The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 2, ‘Psychiatrist says Pratt was ‘danger’ to himself and others’; Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 4, ‘Pratt se plaas: So lyk dit.’

⁷¹⁶² Arthur Pratt's letter to the secretary of the National Liberal Club, 17 August 1927. NLCA.

⁷¹⁶³ Die Vaderland, 11 April 1960: 4, ‘Pratt was soms gesellig, soms neuroties en onvriendelik’; Rand Daily Mail, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘The enigma that is Pratt’; Guy Spiller, 1999, The Liberal and the Pirate; The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 2, ‘Psychiatrist says Pratt was ‘danger’ to himself and others’; Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 4, ‘Pratt se plaas: So lyk dit.’

⁷¹⁶⁴ David Pratt's application for membership at the National Liberal Club, 1 October 1927. NLCA.

⁷¹⁶⁵ Arthur Pratt's letter to the secretary of the National Liberal Club, 17 August 1927. NLCA.

⁷¹⁶⁶ W. T. Lambourn's letter to the secretary of the National Liberal Club, 28 September 1927. NLCA.

⁷¹⁶⁷ <http://www.nlc.org.uk/>

⁷¹⁶⁸ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.’

Returning to South Africa, Pratt took up farming and assembled the finest herd of Ayrshire cattle in Transvaal. He also diversified, buying a number of businesses, including a confectionery factory in Johannesburg, while owning the largest trout hatchery in South Africa.⁷¹⁶⁹ Thousands of trout were bred in the hatchery from eggs imported from Switzerland and fish worth R300,00 were delivered to Johannesburg every day.⁷¹⁷⁰ Pratt was also part-owner, along with his businesswoman friend, Noel Spiller, of the Crayfish Inn, on Natal's southern coast, which was famous for its seafood. Prominent in the hotel's décor was a gift from Pratt which some diners may have thought strange - the figurehead and the side of a tumbril used to transport lords and ladies to the guillotine during the French Revolution.⁷¹⁷¹ Pratt, like Tsafendas, nurtured the hope that one day a revolution, similar to the one in France, would erupt in South Africa and overthrow apartheid, while those responsible for the system would taste a fate similar to that of the aristocrats in France.⁷¹⁷²

Noel Spiller compared Pratt's reserve and good manners favourably with the behaviour of many of the inn's customers. She said, "I had a lot of the Johannesburg nouveau riche, who used to come into the bar and spend hours talking, bragging – wealthy people. But David used to keep pretty aloof, quiet, dignified. He was a very quiet man, very well-dressed. I don't think David would ever come to dinner without a tie or a scarf (cravat)." Pratt and his first wife would later divorce but he would often bring their small daughter Susan, to the inn. It was Susan, Spiller said, who "years and years afterwards, during the trial, stuck by him to the very end."⁷¹⁷³

Pratt lived in a twenty-five room mansion on a farm some thirty miles from Johannesburg known as Maloney's Eye.⁷¹⁷⁴ On the wall of one of his three studies hung an original Renoir.⁷¹⁷⁵ Pratt loved his farm and called it "a possession, not unlike a mistress, on whom I can shower gifts."⁷¹⁷⁶ The name – Maloney's Eye – was ascribed to the "eye" or origin of the local Magalies River, whose millions of gallons were used for the trout nursery

⁷¹⁶⁹ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960: 3, 'Man of wealth and whims'; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'

⁷¹⁷⁰ Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 4, 'Pratt se plaas: So lyk dit'; Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 5, 'Pratt se woning.'

⁷¹⁷¹ Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷¹⁷² Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷¹⁷³ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷¹⁷⁴ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt'; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, 'Dr. Verwoerd moved to Pretoria'; Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 4, 'Pratt se plaas: So lyk dit.'

⁷¹⁷⁵ Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 5, 'Pratt se woning.'

⁷¹⁷⁶ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

and to supply the small number of inhabitants in the Magaliesburg area, as well as the local railway station.⁷¹⁷⁷

Concerned for the welfare of his Black workers, Pratt had spacious, modern apartment houses built for them on his farm. The homes were of such quality that after Pratt's death, they were rented out to tourists. Pratt also built a school on the farm for the Black workers' children, the Maloney's Eye Farm Primary School. Like Tsafendas, he believed education was extremely important, especially for poor people as a means of climbing out of their poverty. Pratt paid for the construction and maintenance of the school and met the wages of the teachers. The school was so sought after that the children of Africans not employed at the farm turned up for lessons. Pratt simply hired more teachers. The teaching and facilities were so good that some of the children of friends and relatives of his workers came looking for jobs or even a place to stay. Pratt found it difficult to turn them away, invariably finding a way to help them. When he discovered that some of the apartments were illegally occupied by friends and relatives of his labourers, he declined to turn them out, simply ensured they had enough food.⁷¹⁷⁸

Pratt frequently gave bonuses to his workers and sometimes joined them to eat food which had been cooked by his chef. He forbade them to address him as "sir" or "master" or "baas" (boss) which was normal at the time. Pratt's treatment of his workforce was almost heroically generous in comparison with the accepted practices of the time. Commenting on this, his personal assistant, Elizabeth Radsma, who worked closely with him for three and a half years, said Pratt was "a child of a different time, really." She added, "He tried to show it in actions and helping people. But, of course, the government didn't appreciate it."⁷¹⁷⁹ The school still stands today and bears the same name, but there is no indication anywhere of how it came to be built or of the person who made it happen.

Pratt did not restrict his generosity to his Black workers and their children's education. He provided funds that enabled the sons of several of his less wealthy friends, both Black and White, to complete their education, and he made⁷¹⁸⁰ regular donations to poor people⁷¹⁸¹ and to a large number of charities. By faith, he was an Anglican and regularly

⁷¹⁷⁷ Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 4, 'Pratt se plaas: So lyk dit.'

⁷¹⁷⁸ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷¹⁷⁹ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷¹⁸⁰ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960, 'Strange whims of man held after the shooting.'

⁷¹⁸¹ The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title.'

attended St. Peter's Church, Krugersdorp,⁷¹⁸² but later he became Roman Catholic,⁷¹⁸³ probably under the influence of his second wife, Patricia, a devout Catholic. When he was detained in the prison hospital, Pratt's reading was almost entirely composed of works by Catholic saints and theologians.⁷¹⁸⁴

In South Africa in 1935, Pratt, aged twenty-six, married Mary Lindsay Hatrick and they had two children: Susan, born in 1937, and David John, born in 1940.⁷¹⁸⁵ David John died of asthma five years later, a loss that grieved Pratt for the rest of his life. He became depressed and tended to isolate.⁷¹⁸⁶ One year after his son's death and after eleven years of marriage, Mary divorced Pratt and was given sole custody of Susan from the ages of fourteen to twenty-one.⁷¹⁸⁷

Upon the outbreak of the Second World War in 1939, Pratt volunteered for the South African Air Force, but because of his epilepsy, he was declared unfit for flying duties. He was given a desk job where his accounting knowledge was employed in a clerical capacity. He was released in October 1943.⁷¹⁸⁸ With the war over in 1945, Pratt travelled to Boston in the United States the following year in search of a cure for his epilepsy. He did not find one.⁷¹⁸⁹

In 1948, Pratt met twenty-one-year-old Doreen Billson. He suggested a date at the cinema, but pretended to be a poor farmer and asked her to buy the tickets. Doreen liked the joke and despite the difference in their ages – Pratt was then thirty-nine – they formed a deep relationship. According to Billson, after three years together they were talking of marriage, but in 1951, Pratt met twenty-seven-year-old Patricia van Heyningen,⁷¹⁹⁰ fell in love and married her instead. However, he stayed in contact with Billson and in 1959 she moved into ⁷¹⁸² The Star, 11 April 1966: 1, 'Pratt confided worries to Rector-who respects trust.'

⁷¹⁸³ The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 6, 'Pratt's friend tells court of receiving suicide notes.'

⁷¹⁸⁴ Gray, 1993: 12.

⁷¹⁸⁵ Petition of Mary Lindsey Cumming, 16 February 1953. Opposed application. Mary Lindsay Cumming versus David Beresford Pratt. 877/1953. NASA.

⁷¹⁸⁶ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷¹⁸⁷ Petition of Mary Lindsey Cumming, 16 February 1953. Opposed application. Mary Lindsay Cumming versus David Beresford Pratt. 877/1953. NASA; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, 'Mental health of Pratt.'

⁷¹⁸⁸ Psychiatric Report on Pratt by Prof. Lamont. Accused reactions to information gleaned from documents, friends, relatives and employees in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷¹⁸⁹ Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷¹⁹⁰ Reuter, IS1154. 2 September 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

the guest house on Pratt's farm. Billson said life with Pratt was wonderful, except for one unsettling habit: "He was very much the fun-loving and cheerful type. A gentle, kindly man, his only failing, as far as I was concerned, was his dreadful habit of changing his mind. This made outsiders regard him as a moody, morose character ... he was a wonderful, but very unhappy man."⁷¹⁹¹ Pratt proposed marriage to her five times and on each occasion, he later changed his mind. Yet, such was his charisma and kindness, that Billson loved him to the end of his life.⁷¹⁹²

A serious side-effect of epilepsy is depression,⁷¹⁹³ which dogged Pratt year in and year out, despite treatment in South Africa, England and the United States.⁷¹⁹⁴ Sometime in the early 1950s, Pratt visited Dr. Werner E. J. Leigh, a senior lecturer in the Pharmacology Department at the University of the Witwatersrand, commonly known as Wits, who became a personal friend. Dr. Leigh started Pratt on a drug which caused him to feel euphoric and experience "strange visions." Dr. Leigh assured Pratt that these were known side-effects but that the drug which would reduce the epileptic attacks. Pratt's seizures were indeed markedly reduced, but he never escaped bouts of depression.⁷¹⁹⁵

In the mid-1950s, Pratt met Sir Paul Dukes,⁷¹⁹⁶ a former MI6 agent, author and one of those responsible for introducing yoga to the western world and South Africa. Dukes had given a series of yoga lectures at the Langham Hotel in Johannesburg which Pratt joined. Afterwards, he declared that he "derived considerable benefit" from them. He became friendly with Dukes, who became "a frequent visitor" to Pratt's house. Dukes' philosophy, character and teaching had a tremendous appeal to Pratt and he described him as his "strong pillar." Pratt was deeply disappointed when Dukes left South Africa in October 1957, although the two remained close by corresponding regularly.⁷¹⁹⁷

⁷¹⁹¹ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷¹⁹² Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt's secret romance.'

⁷¹⁹³ Epilepsy.org.uk. Retrieved from <https://www.epilepsy.org.uk/info/depression>

⁷¹⁹⁴ Prof. Hurst's testimony at the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Dr. Chesler's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷¹⁹⁵ Gordon Winter's correspondence with David Beresford, 8 September 1998. Liza Key's personal collection.

⁷¹⁹⁶ Dukes, known as the "man of a hundred faces," was a legend for his espionage exploits and was knighted for his success by King George V in 1920.

⁷¹⁹⁷ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

Pratt's second wife, Patricia van Heyningen, was a Dutch architect from The Hague. She and Pratt had two children, Georgina, born in 1953, and Charles David, born in 1956.⁷¹⁹⁸ In 1954, Pratt's father died, leaving his son a legacy worth some $750,000.⁷¹⁹⁹ Also in 1954, Pratt began receiving treatment for his epilepsy from a new practitioner, Dr. Benjamin Chesler. He remained under his care until 1958 and during this period he was admitted to the Tara Hospital and the private Sanatoria Nursing Home.⁷²⁰⁰

Around the mid-1950s, Patricia proposed that the family move to Europe.⁷²⁰¹ She said she was not happy in South Africa, which she considered to be a racist nation, and she had never envisaged it as a permanent home. She believed Holland was a better place to bring up children.⁷²⁰² Pratt was reluctant, partly because of his business obligations but also because he loved life in South Africa. Eventually, sometime in the mid-1950s, the family made the move to Europe.⁷²⁰³

Pratt soon discovered that he could not live away from South Africa and so returned, expecting his family to follow soon. Instead, Patricia insisted that he should return to Holland and live permanently there. In an attempt to convince him, she booked tickets for the famous Rotterdam Horse Show and for a music festival in Schevening; she even arranged for him to meet Prince Bernhard and present him with a gift of smoked trout from his farm. Pratt complied with all these plans but remained unimpressed. He still wanted to get back to South Africa with his family.⁷²⁰⁴

Patricia did not give up on her efforts and tried to interest her husband in a Catholic way of life, and even took him to Lourdes, in France, one of the Church's holiest shrines, in a desperate attempt to find a cure for his epilepsy. The Virgin Mary was said to have appeared several times at Lourdes in 1858 to a peasant girl, Bernadette. Pilgrims bathed in a spring which emerged where the Virgin appeared, in the hope that they would be cured of their ⁷¹⁹⁸ Die Vaderland, 11 April 1960: 4, 'Pratt was soms gesellig, soms neuroties en onvriendelik'; Die Vaderland, 12 April 1960: 3, 'Vriende het mev. Pratt vertel'; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, 'Mental health of Pratt.'

⁷¹⁹⁹ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt'; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, 'Dr. Verwoerd moved to Pretoria.'

⁷²⁰⁰ Dr. Chesler's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁰¹ David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁰² Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷²⁰³ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷²⁰⁴ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

diseases. Pratt was not convinced and instead of bathing in the holy waters, he went to a bullfight. What is more, the lure of Africa could not be denied and in 1957, Pratt returned to South Africa, leaving his family in Holland with an understanding that they would re-join him soon. However, Patricia wrote soon after to say she would not be returning to South Africa on "psychological advice." Pratt was distraught.⁷²⁰⁵

Determined to do whatever was necessary to bring his family back to South Africa, he bought a farm in Cape Town for them, but again Patricia refused.⁷²⁰⁶ Pratt returned to Holland in October or November 1957 hoping that a face-to-face meeting would persuade his wife to relocate. However, Patricia remained adamant and when Pratt returned to South Africa in mid-November of that year, he was deeply depressed.⁷²⁰⁷ Apart from her distaste for South Africa, Patricia had grown increasingly frustrated with her husband's almost constant depression, his epilepsy and his mood swings. She considered that it would be better for their children if they were not constantly in contact with their father and his problems.⁷²⁰⁸

Pratt was mortified that Patricia thought this way, but he knew she had a point. Determined to stay close to his family, he then suggested they spend half the year in South Africa and half in Holland. Once again Patricia refused and for the first time suggested that they should split up temporarily, with herself and the children in Holland and her husband in South Africa. She proposed that they would not get a formal separation or a divorce and would meet three or four times a year until the children were a little older or Pratt's health improved. Pratt was not happy but agreed to go along with this arrangement for the time being.⁷²⁰⁹

However, his desire to reunite the family remained strong and began to take extreme, sometimes eccentric, dimensions. In early 1958, he persuaded Robert Charter, his business partner in the trout hatchery, to fly to Holland to try to change Patricia's mind. When Charter failed, Pratt decided to try again himself. On February 5, 1958, he flew into Schiphol Airport, Amsterdam, where Patricia was waiting for him. When a firearm was found in his ⁷²⁰⁵ David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁰⁶ David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁰⁷ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷²⁰⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷²⁰⁹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

suitcase,⁷²¹⁰ a Dutch immigration officer asked why he had a pistol. Pratt joked that “he wanted to shoot his wife.” The officers did not find the joke funny and barred Pratt from the country.⁷²¹¹

Three months later, in May 1958, this time without a gun in his luggage, Pratt returned to Holland and was allowed to enter. On the evening of his arrival, he turned up unexpectedly at his wife's house in Den Haag and asked to see the children. Patricia had been told about the incident with the gun at the airport and was now afraid of her husband. She told him they were sleeping and he agreed to come back the next day. When Pratt returned, Interpol agents were waiting for him. Pratt produced documents proving his paternity, but they refused to give him access to the children. Patricia then instituted proceedings against Pratt's continuing presence in Holland, maintaining that he was “a dangerous man.”⁷²¹²

The judge however, rejected her petition and said in his judgement, “Mr. Pratt appears to be a gentleman in every sense. I see no reason why he should not stay in Holland for a week and see his children.” Subsequently Pratt remained in Holland and spent time with his family.⁷²¹³ Relations improved between husband and wife and Patricia accepted that Pratt was only joking about shooting her. She was even persuaded to return to South Africa and the whole family returned there. The get-together did not last long, however, and Patricia and the children left again for Holland.⁷²¹⁴

Pratt then became severely depressed. Parted from his adored children, he worried about his business responsibilities while the epilepsy robbed him of peace of mind. At one point, he decided to sign over his money to his children and to charity, change his name and start a new life in a cottage in England. Half-way through the planning, he changed his

⁷²¹⁰ Robert Roderick Charter's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Elizabeth Radsma's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; David Pratt's testimony in the enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; The Chicago Daily Defender, 14 April 1960: 4, 'Gun kept Pratt out of Holland'; Daily Express, 11 April 1960: 1, 'The gunman'; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man'; The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 6, 'Pratt's friend tells court of receiving suicide notes.'

⁷²¹¹ News Chronicle, 11 April 1960: 1, 'Would-be assassin: gunman without a cause'; Richards, 1993: 38.

⁷²¹² David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷²¹³ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷²¹⁴ David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

mind.⁷²¹⁵ Later in 1958, Dr. Chesler suggested to Pratt's sister that she appoint a *curator bonis*⁷²¹⁶ for her brother in order to protect his business interests as he thought that Pratt was unable to handle things himself. Pratt's sister dismissed the advice, whereupon Dr. Chesler asked Pratt to see another psychiatrist as he felt that he could not handle his case any longer.⁷²¹⁷ Subsequently, Pratt was treated by Dr. Solly Jacobson, a neurologist and specialist psychiatrist, and his condition improved significantly.⁷²¹⁸

Before the end of 1958, Pratt revisited his wife and children in Holland, and a little later, the whole family went on holiday together at the ski resort of Kitzbuhl in Austria.⁷²¹⁹ In 1959, Pratt was back in Holland and the family again holidayed together, this time at the mountain resort of Klosters, Switzerland.⁷²²⁰ It seems clearly from Patricia's readiness to spend time with Pratt in the intimacy of family vacations that she did not consider him to be "a dangerous man" or that he had planned to shoot her.

The European get-togethers were fine, but Pratt was so desperate to bring his children to South Africa that he dreamed up a scheme to abduct his daughter Georgina and thus force Patricia and their son to return to South Africa and re-join them. Pratt's plan was to use a helicopter to snatch Georgina in Klosters with the help of Mickey Wood, a British ex-commando and stunt man, whose London gym Pratt visited periodically. He persuaded Wood to join him by showing him legal papers proving his custody of his daughter. Eventually Pratt changed his mind and did not proceed with his kidnap plan.⁷²²¹

Pratt's last, futile visit to Holland was in January or February 1960, when Patricia once more refused to return permanently with him to South Africa. This was the last time he saw his two young children. Of her many past refusals, this one appeared to crush Pratt with a ⁷²¹⁵ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷²¹⁶ A curator bonis is appointed to manage the affairs of a person judged mentally incapable of doing so himself. (Maisels, 1998: 327).

⁷²¹⁷ Dr. Chesler's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²¹⁸ Dr. Solly Jacobson's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Elizabeth Radsma's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²¹⁹ Daily Express, 29 April 1960: 9, 'A gay man.'

⁷²²⁰ King (Daily Express), 12 April 1960: 1, 'He came to Britain to plan a kidnap'; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt's secret romance'; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷²²¹ King (Daily Express), 12 April 1960: 1, 'He came to Britain to plan a kidnap'; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man'; The Star, 12 April 1960, 'Film "stunt man" tells of when Pratt had plan to kidnap daughter.'

devastating finality. Various friends said that when he returned to South Africa on February 18, 1960, he was “a changed man” and “depressed and moody.”⁷²²² For relief, he immersed himself in Yoga and Christian teachings.⁷²²³

Despite his family disappointments and his problems with epilepsy, Pratt maintained a lively interest in South Africa's politics. He was a wealthy man with the privileged status accorded to a White person in a racist society, but he despised the ruling National Party and its policy of apartheid.⁷²²⁴ He often took overseas visitors to the Black townships to show them the harsh reality of apartheid and spoke boldly and openly against it. Elizabeth Radsma said, “He wanted all people to be equal and have equal rights. He had the courage of saying this publicly at the time. He wanted the Black people to be able to vote and participate in the running of the country and he wanted a country where we all can live happily together as equals.”⁷²²⁵

When he heard of the National Party's early plans to introduce laws to impose apartheid, Pratt contemplated suicide. However, after treatment with psychotherapy and anti-depressant drugs, he began thinking more “logically.” Dr. Jacobson, the psychiatrist who replaced Dr. Chesler, pointed out to him that if he committed suicide, he would achieve nothing towards curtailing apartheid.⁷²²⁶

In 1953, Pratt joined the South African Liberal Party and the following year he attempted to negotiate a coalition between Liberals and progressive Afrikaners. He believed this was the only way to defeat the National Party and bring an end to apartheid.⁷²²⁷ Thus, he approached three prominent South Africans: Businessmen Anton Rupert and Harry Oppenheimer, two of the country's wealthiest and most powerful men, and Nicolaas

⁷²²² Elizabeth Radsma's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; The Chicago Daily Defender, 14 April 1960: 4, 'Gun kept Pratt out of Holland'; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'

⁷²²³ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷²²⁴ Ingalls (The New York Times), 11 April 1960, 'Pratt called impulsive'; The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Press silence on Pratt ordered'; TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, 'The assassin of Milner Park.'

⁷²²⁵ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷²²⁶ Bird, 1992: 209.

⁷²²⁷ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; The Cape Argus, 12 September 1960: 2, 'Pratt did not want to kill Dr. Verwoerd District Surgeon says he was told'; The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 2, 'Psychiatrist says Pratt was 'danger' to himself and others.'

Havenga, a former leader of the Afrikaner Party and a Minister of Finance in the governments of Malan and Hertzog. The first to be approached was Oppenheimer. Pratt telephoned and the two met several times. Pratt "proposed certain things to form a coalition government." Oppenheimer liked the idea and "agreed to co-operate" and said he would talk to other possible participants, including Rupert.⁷²²⁸

Pratt then approached Havenga, who was also positive and agreed to lead the proposed coalition while trying to find additional support. However, Rupert was unenthusiastic and neither Pratt nor Oppenheimer were able to change his mind. Other prominent businessmen and liberal politicians were approached by Pratt or Oppenheimer but most declined to co-operate. Finally, Pratt met in a private room in the House of Assembly with Havenga to discuss the progress of his proposal. Havenga thought they should give up because they did not have the necessary support, while Pratt wanted to keep trying. However, after "a long argument," Pratt realised that his "scheme could not be carried out" and so gave up on it and "resigned" himself "to life under Mr. Strijdom, with Dr. Verwoerd as Minister of Native Affairs. Within forty-eight hours, Pratt had "sunk into a depression."⁷²²⁹

Despite his unhappiness at the failure of his initiative, Pratt did not give up on his fight against apartheid and boldly decided to move his efforts to Britain. The Liberal Party of Great Britain, of which Pratt had been a member since the late 1940s, pursued one of the most energetic anti-apartheid campaigns anywhere in the world and Pratt gave it his enthusiastic support. He became a major financier of the Liberal Party, urging and promoting an ever more aggressive stance against apartheid. Each time he returned to the UK, he gave speeches on behalf of the Party, arguing for a boycott of South African goods and a stronger stance against apartheid. Among Party members with whom he associated was Jeremy Thorpe, who became the leader of the Party in 1967, and David Ennals, Chairman of the British anti-apartheid movement. In addition, he addressed crowds three times at the famous public arena, Speaker's Corner, in London's Hyde Park, and several times helped with fundraising events for the Party.⁷²³⁰

⁷²²⁸ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow; Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷²²⁹ Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

⁷²³⁰ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Daily Express, 27 September 1960: 21, 'The sword tattoo'; Psychiatric Report on Pratt by Prof. Lamont. Accused reactions to information gleaned from documents, friends, relatives and employees in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; The Cape Argus, 26 September 1960: 2, 'Judge rules Pratt is mentally disordered'; The Times (London), 27 September 1960: 6, 'Pratt held to be mentally disordered.'

During the 1959 British general election, Pratt canvassed door to door for the Liberals. Cheekily, he carried his campaign to Downing Street itself, where he was photographed with Derek Monsey, Liberal candidate for the City of London and Westminster, knocking on the door of number 10, the Prime Minister's residence. Monsey came third of three candidates in the poll.⁷²³¹ Apart from his Liberal Party activities, Pratt also associated with some far-left political activists, who opposed apartheid.⁷²³² Although he did not sympathize with Communism, Pratt often declared that he would prefer a Communist South Africa to an apartheid South Africa and was willing to co-operate with anyone who could bring an end to apartheid.⁷²³³

A few months before he shot Dr. Verwoerd, Pratt explained his position on apartheid to Bute Hewes, wife of Bruce Hewes a member of the British Liberal Party. He said, "A lot of us (South Africans) don't like what is going on in South Africa, but what is the alternative? It's our country and we can't just run out on it. It's our home. But some of us want to see things put straight out there. Apartheid can't last."⁷²³⁴

⁷²³¹ Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, 'The day farmer Pratt called at No. 10'; Evening Standard, 11 April 1960: 1, 'Death for gunman?'

⁷²³² Schoeman, 1975: 18.

⁷²³³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷²³⁴ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.'

THE SHOOTING

BEFORE THE SHOOTING

Pratt returned to South Africa from England for the last time on February 18, 1960.⁷²³⁵ Sometime in the middle of March, he had an epileptic seizure and fell from his horse.⁷²³⁶ That month and April were turbulent ones in South Africa. On March 21, the Sharpeville massacre took place, causing Pratt to fall into another depression.⁷²³⁷ On March 30, the government declared a state of emergency and 11,700 people were rounded up. On April 7, the police re-imposed the hated Pass Laws which had been suspended after Sharpeville.⁷²³⁸ On April 8, the day before Pratt's assault on Dr. Verwoerd, the government banned the ANC and PAC. The emergency regulations were so draconian that a scientific lecture about sex at the Railway Institute, Witbank, by psychologist Dr. Brian Norgard was banned.⁷²³⁹

At some point during that turbulent first week of April 1960, Dr. Verwoerd commented on the turmoil and references to UN intervention in a filmed interview with Britain's Granada TV. He said, "We in South Africa are trying to do our level best for all portions of our population. We have been misunderstood, unfortunately. If people only realized that we are not the barbarians we are supposed to be, that we are Christians ourselves, then an appeal to the Security Council, except for international political reasons, of course, would not even have been conceived." The interview was shown on British TV screens on April 11, two days after Dr. Verwoerd was shot.⁷²⁴⁰

On March 26, 1960, five days after Sharpeville, a rally in favour of South Africa becoming a republic was held in Meyerton, Transvaal. It was the largest political meeting in the history of South Africa, with eighty thousand people gathering to listen to Dr. Verwoerd. According to Die Burger, earlier that day, a security officer reportedly showed Dr. Verwoerd ⁷²³⁵ Elizabeth Radsma's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²³⁶ Dr. Jack Friedman's testimony at the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Richard Kumalo's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Elizabeth Radsma's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²³⁷ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷²³⁸ News Chronicle, 7 April 1960: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd brings the Pass Laws back.'

⁷²³⁹ The Sunday Tribune, 10 April 1960: 1, 'Sex talk banned under emergency rules.'

⁷²⁴⁰ Corriere Della Sera, 8 September 1966: 1, 'L'apartheid'; Daily Mirror, 12 April: 5, 'Misunderstood says Dr. Verwoerd'; The Chicago Daily Defender, 13 April 1960: 3, 'South Africa not yielding on race'; The Star, 12 April 1960, 'If people only realised that we are Christians.'

a piece of red paper bearing the words, “Today we kill Dr. Verwoerd.” However, the Prime Minister went ahead and gave his speech.⁷²⁴¹

The story of the note was first published on April 11, two days after Pratt’s assault, in Die Burger, a Nationalist newspaper which supported Dr. Verwoerd, and the source was said to be Dr. Verwoerd’s wife.⁷²⁴² As far as the author can establish, the origin and authenticity, indeed the existence of such a note, have never been determined. Prominent South African journalists David Beresford, correspondent for Britain’s liberal daily, the Guardian, and Desmond Blow of the South African Sunday Times, as well as former BOSS agent Gordon Winter, strongly believe the story was a publicity stunt to increase Dr. Verwoerd’s popularity and give him a heroic status.⁷²⁴³ The report appeared just twenty days after the Sharpeville Massacre when the Prime Minister’s popularity was very low, especially overseas. The story bestowed on Verwoerd a certain heroic status as someone who was aware of threats against him yet dutifully went ahead with his public duties. That he was shot obviously gave some credence to the story. However, it should be mentioned that on June 1, 1961, just over a year after Verwoerd was shot by Pratt, the New York Times reported that a guard at the Prime Minister’s residence in Cape Town was shot in the shoulder.⁷²⁴⁴ The circumstances of the shooting were never explained as far as the author can establish.

Noel Spiller, Pratt’s Crayfish Inn partner, said that sometime in early April, she, Pratt and others were discussing the political situation, mainly the issue of passes. Pratt said, “It’s terrible, the way they are all rounded up because they haven’t a dompas.” Spiller said, “The discussion was political, as it can be. I can remember somebody saying, ‘Oh, somebody should shoot that man,’ referring to Dr. Verwoerd. And David said, ‘Somebody should. I think it should be me.’”⁷²⁴⁵

A few days later, Pratt passed a pickup van in Johannesburg loaded with prisoners, then saw another van being loaded with women prisoners. The sight had a profound effect on him, initially disgust and depression but later anger. He wondered, “What will happen next?” The following morning, he felt strongly that “someone had to do something,” and decided ⁷²⁴¹ Grobbelaar 1967: 71; The Star, 11 April 1960: 11, ‘Dr. Verwoerd knew of threats by did not withdraw.’

⁷²⁴² Grobbelaar 1967: 71; The Star, 11 April 1960: 11, ‘Dr. Verwoerd knew of threats by did not withdraw.’

⁷²⁴³ David Beresford in a personal interview, 11 April 2014; Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Gordon Winter in a personal interview with Dr. James Sanders on behalf of the author, 19 August 2016.

⁷²⁴⁴ The New York Times, 2 June 1961: 18, ‘Verwoerd guard is shot.’

⁷²⁴⁵ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

that it was time for him to act.⁷²⁴⁶ Coincidentally, on that same day in London, the Liberal Party asked the British government publicly to denounce the “repressive” policies of the South African government during the forthcoming Commonwealth Conference in London, and to enforce an arms embargo on South Africa. Simultaneous demands voiced in the House of Commons and elsewhere asked the government not to invite Dr. Verwoerd to the London conference.⁷²⁴⁷

THE SHOOTING

On Saturday, April 9, 1960, Pratt left his home at around 9.30 a.m. and said that he would be back at 7.30 in the evening.⁷²⁴⁸ Soon afterwards, he Pratt arrived at the old show grounds in Milner Park, Johannesburg, for the Union Exposition (the Rand Easter Show⁷²⁴⁹) of which he was co-sponsor⁷²⁵⁰ and where his cattle had won many prizes.⁷²⁵¹ He was wearing a green tweed suit.⁷²⁵²

Dr. Verwoerd was scheduled to open the show in front of some 30,000 people with a speech marking the fiftieth anniversary of the Union of South Africa.⁷²⁵³ When he took up his position in the President’s box overlooking the arena, Pratt was among the VIPs sitting near him.⁷²⁵⁴ At 2.15 p.m., Dr. Verwoerd began a thirty-minute his speech⁷²⁵⁵ with the following light-hearted comment: “Mr. President, good friends, all of you who are here today, it is with great pleasure that I perform this duty immediately before I forget, and that is to declare this ⁷²⁴⁶ Professor L.A. Hurst’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; David Pratt’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷²⁴⁷ The New York Times, 10 April 1960, ‘Queen shocked, wished Dr. Verwoerd speedy recovery.’

⁷²⁴⁸ The Sunday Tribune, 10 April 1960: 1, ‘Premier’s miraculous escape.’

⁷²⁴⁹ The Rand Show has been reported as the largest consumer exhibition in the world, outside of the United States. Coinciding with Easter festivities, it is both culturally and socially significant show. First held in 1894 by the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society and opened by Paul Kruger at Milner Park in Braamfontein, it still takes place today (Komane, 1 April 2015, ‘Rand Show turns 121.’)

⁷²⁵⁰ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.’

⁷²⁵¹ The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Dr. Verwoerd moved to Pretoria.’

⁷²⁵² Testimony of Jacobus Esterhuizen in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title.’

⁷²⁵³ TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, ‘The assassin of Milner Park.’

⁷²⁵⁴ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960: 3, ‘Doctors satisfied with Dr. Verwoerd.’

⁷²⁵⁵ Mulchrone (Daily Mail), 3 October 1961: 8, ‘The improbable assassin’; Schoop (Atlanta Daily World), 10 April 1960: 1, ‘S. Africa Premier shot after segregation talk’; The Chicago Daily Defender, 16 April 1960: 1, ‘S. African Premier shot by farmer’; Washington Post, 10 April 1960: 4, ‘White farmer shoots South Africa’s Premier.’

show open. I know it is customary to do this at the end of a speech but I know of gentlemen who have had to rise again to do so after being seated, which I am sure you would not wish me to inflict upon you.”⁷²⁵⁶

He went on to say:

“We are indeed glad that these nations of the western world are showing us what they can produce. Their competition must be our incentive, and not create in us any fear. What they have to sell to us must be a symbol of goodwill, and we are happy to have them in our midst. We wish to congratulate them on all that they have done for their countries and for the world, and we desire only the utmost of good relations with them, because no country in the world today can exist alone, and no country in the world can achieve greater heights for itself by treading on the corpse of a fellow nation. We will not be killed, we will not become anybody’s victim. We will fight for our existence and we will survive ... My faith in the people of South Africa is deep-seated and I believe that all that we inherited by way of intellect and diligence and courage will help us in all spheres represented at this wonderful show to continue building up a grander South Africa in the next fifty years than in the fifty years that are past.”⁷²⁵⁷

After his speech, Dr. Verwoerd and his accompanying VIPs went to inspect the cattle in the arena and then returned to the enclosure for guests of honour.⁷²⁵⁸ It was then that Pratt made his way towards where the prime minister was sitting, moving through a security cordon with a badge identifying him as a member of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society. He walked fast with long strides.⁷²⁵⁹ Pratt then mounted a photographer’s chair and called out, “Dr. Verwoerd!” Dr. Verwoerd turned, assuming someone wanted to greet him, only to find a Belgian .22 calibre automatic pistol pointed directly at him.⁷²⁶⁰ Pratt fired and a bullet the size of an airgun pellet struck Dr. Verwoerd in the face.⁷²⁶¹ According to eye-witness Alex Gorshel, the Mayor of Johannesburg, Pratt fired once, wearing “a rather strained smile”

⁷²⁵⁶ Pelzer, 1966: 388-9

⁷²⁵⁷ Pelzer, 1966: 393.

⁷²⁵⁸ Grobbelaar 1967: 80.

⁷²⁵⁹ Testimony of Jacobus Esterhuizen in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Atlanta Daily World, 10 April 1960: 1, ‘S. Africa Premier shot after segregation talk.’

⁷²⁶⁰ Afro-American, 16 April 1960: 1, ‘African fight to go underground’; Atlanta Daily World, 10 April 1960: 1, ‘S. Africa Premier shot after segregation talk’; LIFE, 16 September 1966: 41, ‘A violent end for the apostle of apartheid’; Scholtz, 1974: 152; Sunday Times, 10 April 1960: 28, ‘Dr. Verwoerd shot twice.’

⁷²⁶¹ Haigh, 1962: 6.

as he pulled the trigger.⁷²⁶² Then Col. G.M. Harrison, president of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society, grabbed Pratt's arm and the gun went off again.⁷²⁶³

Dr. Verwoerd fell into the concrete aisle, blood spurting from two wounds. One of the bullets had entered his head next to the right ear, fracturing the lower jaw, breaking the palate and coming to rest in the left side of the neck. The other bullet struck his upper right jawbone below the right eye, shattering the bone into pieces which pierced the sinus.⁷²⁶⁴ His wife flung her arms around him, crying, "What's happened? What's happened?" Dr. Verwoerd's personal bodyguard, Major Carl Richter, was a few feet away and seemed slow to realize what happened; when he did so, he fainted. Charles Laubscher, a former general manager of the Witwatersrand Society who knew Pratt personally, shouted, "Get the gun." Pratt half smiled and said, "Don't worry, I haven't got it now." Guards seized Pratt and hustled him out of the President's box through furious crowds of whites struggling to reach and attack him. At this point, Pratt seemed terrified and was heard to say, "God help me!"⁷²⁶⁵

AFTER THE SHOOTING

DR. VERWOERD

Dr. Verwoerd was carried to an ambulance and a blanket was hastily flung across its back door to stop cameramen from photographing the stricken prime minister. The emergency vehicle then raced to Johannesburg General Hospital.⁷²⁶⁶ Talking later about the shooting, Dr. Verwoerd said he thought immediately that he would die and said he was quite prepared to do so. However, he then realised that he could still think and then, with all the spirit force at his command, he decided to fight to remain alive.⁷²⁶⁷ In fact, he was never in danger of dying from the gunshot wounds he received, but his supporters were at pains to emphasise how ⁷²⁶² Testimony of Alex Gorshel in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁶³ Dr. Jack Friedman's testimony at the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Testimony of Col. G.M. Harrison in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁶⁴ The New York Times, 17 April 1960: 1, 'Continuing gains reported.'

⁷²⁶⁵ Ingalls, (The New York Times), 11 April 1960, 'Calm prevailing in South Africa: Dr. Verwoerd gains'; Rand Daily Mail, 21 July 1960: 9, 'I wanted to change seats with Premier'; TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, 'The assassin of Milner Park'; The New York Times, 10 April 1960, 'Martial Law Predicted'; The Times (London), 21 July 1960: 10, 'Pratt in court in Dr. Verwoerd attack charge.'

⁷²⁶⁶ Die Vaderland, 11 April 1960: 5, 'So het alles gebeur.'

⁷²⁶⁷ Scholtz, 1974: 152.

close to death he came. Dr. Joseph Lannon, who attended Dr. Verwoerd at the hospital after the shooting said, “There was no immediate danger to his life, but in terms of time there could quite easily have been.” He said that there was a risk of infection which could have caused meningitis. He gave Dr. Verwoerd a blood transfusion.⁷²⁶⁸

When his situation stabilised, senior politicians demanded that Dr. Verwoerd be transferred from the Johannesburg General Hospital to the Pretoria General Hospital, from an English-speaking ambience to an Afrikaner one.⁷²⁶⁹ He was treated by two well-known doctors H. W. Snyman and S. F. Oosthuizen.⁷²⁷⁰ When Dr. Verwoerd was lying seriously wounded in hospital in Johannesburg, the only person permitted to see him, apart from his wife Bessie, was Piet Meyer, a close friend, chairman of the South African Broadcasting Corporation, and a fanatical Nazi.⁷²⁷¹ On April 12, Paul Oliver Sauer, head of the Nationalist Party in Parliament, took over from Dr. Verwoerd as head of government.⁷²⁷² From his bed, Dr. Verwoerd ordered Eric Louw, a close associate, to represent South Africa at the forthcoming Commonwealth Conference in London.⁷²⁷³

Dr. Verwoerd saw himself as a martyr for the cause of apartheid and attributed his recovery to divine intervention, believing God had chosen him to continue piloting apartheid. During a visit to his bedside by opposition leader Sir de Villiers Graaff, Dr. Verwoerd referred to God more than a dozen times, insisting that the deity had chosen him to continue guiding apartheid. In the course of a two-hour conversation, he insisted that his survival was proof of the divine acceptance of his policies.⁷²⁷⁴ When Major Richter visited him in hospital, Dr. Verwoerd depicted himself as an Afrikaner martyr for the apartheid cause. He said he held no grievances against anyone, adding, “I cannot even feel bitter towards Pratt” and described himself as “just one of the martyrs of the Afrikaner nation.”⁷²⁷⁵ At the same time, Dr. Verwoerd told his wife, “I heard the shots and then I realized that I could still think, and I ⁷²⁶⁸ Testimony of Dr. Joseph Lannon in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 21 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷²⁶⁹ Bird, 1992: 205-6; Botha, 1967: 65.

⁷²⁷⁰ Scholtz, 1974: 152.

⁷²⁷¹ Serfontein, 1978: 87.

⁷²⁷² Philadelphia Tribune, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Farmer’s motive In Dr. Verwoerd shooting cloaked in mystery.’

⁷²⁷³ Mulchrone (Daily Mail), 3 October 1961: 8, ‘The improbable assassin’; ⁷²⁷⁴ Vatcher, 1965: 110.

⁷²⁷⁵ Scholtz, 1974: 153.

knew that I had been spared to complete my life's work."⁷²⁷⁶ Betsie Verwoerd also saw her husband's survival as "a sign to us that we are on the right path and God is with us."⁷²⁷⁷

Dr. Verwoerd's followers fully agreed that Dr. Verwoerd had been saved by God in order to fulfil his "duties" and that God had chosen him as his instrument to lead and forge the South African nation.⁷²⁷⁸ Die Transvaler wrote that Dr. Verwoerd was "called by God to a special task." It declared that, "although struck by two bullets, Dr. Verwoerd is still alive and all believing inhabitants of the Union will see the hand of God in this... he who holds the power of life or death has ordained that the attack should fail."⁷²⁷⁹ Die Burger wrote two days after the shooting, "In this miraculous escape all the faithful will see the hand of God and thank him that our country, which is already passing through troubled times, had been spared the greater horror of assassination of its head of state."⁷²⁸⁰

The TIME magazine wrote that the Afrikaners regarded his recovery as proof that God had chosen Dr. Verwoerd as his divine instrument to forge the South African nation.⁷²⁸¹ In the words of his biographer Jan Botha, Dr. Verwoerd "had suffered grievously in the cause of Afrikanerdom; the onslaught on his life was an onslaught on their cause, and the human sympathy that went out to him became, in the case of many, an enduring love for a hero who so miraculously survived the ordeal to lead them on."⁷²⁸²

On May 7, the two bullets were removed during surgery from Dr. Verwoerd's head.⁷²⁸³ He made a rapid and complete recovery, except for a small scar on his jaw and deafness in his right ear.⁷²⁸⁴ On May 15, he walked from the hospital room to a waiting car and arriving at his home, he climbed the steps unaided. On May 20, Dr. Verwoerd addressed the nation in a radio broadcast and on May 31, fifty-two days after the shooting, he made his first public appearance at the Union Festival in Bloemfontein.⁷²⁸⁵

In his radio broadcast of May 20, his first public speech after the shooting, Dr. Verwoerd said, "I do not intend to dwell upon the attack made upon me. In fact, it does not

⁷²⁷⁶ TIME, 16 September 1966, 'South Africa: Death to the architect.'

⁷²⁷⁷ Ingalls (The New York Times), 18 April 1960: 1, 'South Africans said to consider sealing borders.'

⁷²⁷⁸ TIME, 16 September 1966, 'South Africa: Death to the architect.'

⁷²⁷⁹ Daily Dispatch, 12 April 1960: 1, 'Premier called by God to a special task.'

⁷²⁸⁰ Roux, 1972: 411.

⁷²⁸¹ TIME, 16 September 1966, 'South Africa: Death to the architect.'

⁷²⁸² Botha, 1967: 67.

⁷²⁸³ Botha, 1967: 65; Pelzer, 1967: 393.

⁷²⁸⁴ The New York Times, 7 September 1966: 16, 'Dr. Verwoerd: Relentless advocate of apartheid.'

⁷²⁸⁵ Botha, 1967: 65; Pelzer, 1967: 393.

arouse in me feelings of hatred or revenge. Those who created the atmosphere which made such an act possible have, however, reason to suffer from a guilty conscience. A person who has suffered, and this is also true of a nation, should rather look to the future and press forward. If one is spared, it is in order to fulfil further duties. Similarly, if a nation has been spared for centuries in a land of hardship but also of great promise, it too has a task to fulfil... I trust that I will be permitted to testify to my conviction that the protection of Divine Providence was accorded me with a purpose, a purpose which concerns South Africa too. May it be given to me to fulfil that task faithfully.”⁷²⁸⁶ Dr. Verwoerd later went so far as to tell the Canadian Prime Minister John Diefenbaker that his survival “revealed God’s approval of the cause he had followed.”⁷²⁸⁷

In political terms, Dr. Verwoerd undoubtedly benefited from the attempt on his life. Colin Legum wrote in the London Observer that the twenty-day crisis that started at Sharpeville on March 21 and ended with Pratt’s assault on April 9, found the recovered Dr. Verwoerd in a much stronger position than in the aftermath of Sharpeville; forces within the Government which had been plotting Dr. Verwoerd’s overthrow for the last twelve months were forced to do an about-turn and praise him. For the time being, all talk of an alternative Government was irrelevant, Legum wrote, unless Dr. Verwoerd was more seriously injured than stated or unless external pressure brought South Africa’s economy to its knees.⁷²⁸⁸

Dr. Verwoerd’s new support played an important role in securing the votes of most of South Africa’s whites in favour of one of his main goals: to turn South Africa into a Republic. A sardonic limerick celebrated his recovery: “There was a young man named Pratt,/ Who took a pot-shot at a Nat,/ He said: ‘Had I known/ There’d have been so much bone,/ I’d have bought me a much bigger gat.”⁷²⁸⁹

Bizarrely, while Dr. Verwoerd was recovering in Pretoria General Hospital, a connection with Pratt himself was revealed. On April 17, the hospital discussed changing its milk supplier after it became known that the milk came from a firm called Maloney’s Eye Dairies, based in Krugersdorp, whose cows were owned by David Pratt. The herd was ⁷²⁸⁶ Pelzer, 1966: 396-397; The New York Times, 21 May 1960: 11, ‘Dr. Verwoerd asserts God saved his life’; The Sphere, 4 June 1960: 410, ‘The voice of the Common.’

⁷²⁸⁷ The Globe and Mail, 7 September 1966: 3, ‘Canada regrets death but stand still same’; The Vancouver Sun, 6 September 1966: 3, ‘Verwoerd assassination shocks world leaders.’

⁷²⁸⁸ Legum (The Observer), 17 April 1960: 16, ‘The world and South Africa.’

⁷²⁸⁹ Hope (The Independent), 9 September 2000: 9, ‘The lunatics in charge of the apartheid asylum - Which was madder: the PM who enforced South Africa’s racial fantasies, or the deluded drifter who killed him?’

actually leased to Mr. C.A.S. Bouwer, in the Magaliesburg district, and he was providing the milk to the above firm. Bouwer said Pratt had not been interested in the herd for some time and he had leased his herd to him. However, some consumers in Krugersdorp, learning of the link to Pratt, protested about the milk being supplied to the hospital, while several state institutions also complained. Private consumers, restaurants, tea rooms and hotels threatened to stop buying from the firm, although it was not related with Pratt. Eventually, Maloney's Eye Dairies cancelled its contract with Bouwer on "moral grounds." The hospital and other institutions then affirmed that they would continue buying from the firm since it no longer bought its milk from cows once owned by Pratt.⁷²⁹⁰

Needless to say, this was not enough for one fanatic, who threatened to blow up the milk depot, while several threatening phone-calls were received and some private customers did cancel their milk orders.⁷²⁹¹ In another bizarre connection, while Dr. Verwoerd was recovering at the Pretoria General Hospital, Susan Pratt, David's daughter, was admitted there on April 20 after a car accident. She had swerved to avoid a dog while "fleeing to escape the hounding of the Press."⁷²⁹²

Professor of History Saul Dubow suggested in 2014 that "had Verwoerd died at the hands of David Pratt in 1960 it is unlikely that apartheid would have been pursued with comparable ideological vigour."⁷²⁹³ He added:

"It is not altogether inconceivable that some form of meaningful political process—along the lines of the much talked about 'national convention'—could have been inaugurated between Luthuli and a more flexible successor to Verwoerd (e.g. Donges or Sauer). The overwhelming political crisis and palpable sense of fluidity might just have made this possible, and there were overseas mediators like Dag Hammarskjold who were primed to intervene. But Verwoerd did not die and, in any case, it remains unlikely that Whites were ready to countenance any real loss of power."⁷²⁹⁴

⁷²⁹⁰ Sunday Times, 17 April 1960: 1, 'The riddle of Pratt milk supply solved'; The Sunday Tribune, 17 April 1960: 1, 'Pratt visited by daughter.'

⁷²⁹¹ The Star, 13 April 1960, 'Dairy named after Pratt threatened.'

⁷²⁹² The Cape Times, 20 April 1960: 1, 'Pratt's daughter injured'; The Times, 20 April 1960: 12, 'David Pratt's daughter injured.'

⁷²⁹³ Dubow, 2014: 300.

⁷²⁹⁴ Dubow, 2014: 88.

PRATT

Immediately after the shooting, the police bundled Pratt into a police car, with his jacket pulled over his head, and drove him to the Marshall Square police station in Johannesburg.⁷²⁹⁵ His whereabouts were not immediately divulged. Col. J.C. Hemmer, Witwatersrand Deputy Commissioner of Police, refused to tell the Press, “for the man’s own safety,” where Pratt had been taken.⁷²⁹⁶ He was held under the Emergency Regulations,⁷²⁹⁷ which allowed the state to hold anyone whose detention was considered desirable in the interest of public order or safety.⁷²⁹⁸

In charge of Pratt’s interrogation at the police station was Colonel Spangler, Chief of the Johannesburg Police, a man with a fearful reputation. British MP John Dugdale once spoke of seeing Spangler and his principal officers at work in the building of the Indian National Congress in Johannesburg. He said, “A tougher lot of men I have never seen since the Gestapo was disbanded.”⁷²⁹⁹

Around 6.45 pm, some three hours after he was brought to Marshall Square police station, Pratt was taken on the orders of Detective Head-Constable P.J. Koekemoer to the Medico-Legal Laboratories in Johannesburg, where he was examined by Dr. Jack Friedman, senior District Surgeon of Johannesburg.⁷³⁰⁰ Dr. Friedman concluded that Pratt had received “quite a beating up,” with “extensive bruising on both cheeks, multiple small abrasions,” all injuries “consistent with blows from fists.” Nevertheless, Pratt was calm and coherent, Dr. Friedman noted and appeared remarkably unconcerned about what happened. His blood pressure was 148 over 88, that is, within normal limits. Dr. Friedman also took a blood sample which contained only .02 alcohol in weight volume. Later, Dr. Friedman visited Pratt ⁷²⁹⁵ Ingalls, (The New York Times), 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Calm prevailing in South Africa: Dr. Verwoerd gains’; The Cape Argus, 9 April 1966: 1, ‘Dr. Verwoerd wounded on Rand’; The Star, 9 April 1966: 1, ‘The Prime Minister is shot.’

⁷²⁹⁶ The Sunday Tribune, 10 April 1960: 1, ‘Premier’s miraculous escape.’

⁷²⁹⁷ Die Vaderland, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Speurhoof se staat kan Pratt enige tyd vervolg’; Gray, 1960: 185; The Cape Times, 12 April 1966: 1, ‘Pratt held under emergency’; The Economist, 16 April 1966: 230, ‘South Africa: State of siege.’

⁷²⁹⁸ Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, ‘And now he must be ‘nameless.’

⁷²⁹⁹ Dugdale (The Guardian), 14 April 1960: 12, ‘South African impressions: Ruthless but inefficient.’

⁷³⁰⁰ Dr. Jack Friedman’s testimony at the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Testimony of Petrus Johannes Koekemoer to Pratt’s preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

several times at Marshall Square police station to ensure he was receiving the medical treatment prescribed for his epilepsy.⁷³⁰¹

Dr. Friedman's examination took about forty-five minutes, whereupon he concluded that "as result of his (Pratt's) unconcern that he displayed and other features in connection with this examination" he needed an expert psychiatric opinion. He asked Professor Lewis A. Hurst, a psychiatrist, of the University of Witwatersrand, to examine Pratt as soon as possible.⁷³⁰² Prof. Hurst's examination lasted nearly two hours, from around 8:10 to 10 p.m. Also present were Dr. Friedman, Detective Head-Constable Koekemoer and another doctor (the author is not in position to know who this doctor was). Pratt remained calm and conversed with Prof. Hurst in a "coherent, lucid manner."⁷³⁰³ Prof. Hurst also examined Pratt physically and found "extensive bruising on both eyes, both sides of the face and front, crepitus of the nose, and bleeding from both ears."⁷³⁰⁴ The issue of Pratt's injuries will be discussed very shortly.

What must be stated here is that Prof. Hurst was a regular customer at Pratt's Crayfish Inn and a good friend of Noel Spiller, Pratt's partner.⁷³⁰⁵ It is not known to the author whether Hurst also knew Pratt or if he had seen him before the examination, but he must surely at least have been aware of who he was when he examined him. The author also does not know why specifically Prof. Hurst was chosen by Dr. Friedman to examine Pratt that evening, which could have been because of the two doctors' friendship or professional relationship. At that time, Pratt was under the care of Dr. Solly Jacobson, but the fact that he was not called by Dr. Friedman may have been because Pratt did not mention him. It should also be noted that both Prof. Hurst and Dr. Jacobson were against apartheid, while the latter was also a Communist.

⁷³⁰¹ Dr. Jack Friedman's testimony at the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA;

⁷³⁰² Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Daily Dispatch, 13 September 1960: 1, 'Special inquiry into mental state of Pratt'; The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 2, 'Psychiatrist says Pratt was 'danger' to himself and others.'

⁷³⁰³ Dr. Jack Friedman's testimony David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding David Pratt's mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Daily Dispatch, 13 September 1960: 1, 'Special inquiry into mental state of Pratt'; The Cape Argus, 13 September 1960: 2, 'Psychiatrist says Pratt was 'danger' to himself and others.'

⁷³⁰⁴ Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷³⁰⁵ Gay Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

THE FOLLOWING DAYS

After the medical examinations, Pratt was taken back to Marshall Square police station, where he spent the night. The next day he was visited by his daughter, Susan. She told journalists that her father seemed dazed and unable to understand what he had done, that he appeared “perfectly contented and not at all upset by his situation.”⁷³⁰⁶ A few hours later, Pratt was taken to the Johannesburg Fort Prison where a number of anti-apartheid activists were detained. One of them, Joe Slovo, leader of the South African Communist Party and commander of the Umkhonto we Sizwe, saw Pratt when he was brought in and said he was covered in blood.⁷³⁰⁷ It seems clear Pratt was beaten again by police after his examination by Dr. Friedman and Prof. Hurst and before arriving at the Fort prison. It would have been highly unusual for the doctors to leave Pratt covered in blood from his first beating while they examined him. As for his earlier injuries, it was claimed later in court that it was the crowd which attacked him immediately after the shooting. However, photographs were available of Pratt at that point and no blood or injuries were visible as he was pushed into the police car.

Pratt remained in the Fort Prison for several weeks without charge or access to a lawyer. His personal attorney was not told of his client’s whereabouts so he had no means of communicating with him. Pratt’s detention in the Fort prison was kept secret while newspapers and ordinary South Africans wondered, “Where is Pratt?”⁷³⁰⁸ There was also some speculation that Pratt could be charged with treason, which carried the death penalty.⁷³⁰⁹

A few hours after the shooting, officials announced that Pratt suffered from epilepsy, but nothing was said about his mental state.⁷³¹⁰ The American magazine Time and the Guardian newspaper in Britain carried stories saying the black Africans of South Africa should be thankful that the man who attacked Dr. Verwoerd was white, because if he was Black, a bloodbath might have followed.⁷³¹¹

⁷³⁰⁶ Daily Express, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘The gunman’; The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title; Washington Post, 11 April 1960: A8, ‘S. Africa speeds action on assassin.’

⁷³⁰⁷ Slovo, 1995: 131.

⁷³⁰⁸ The Star, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘The legal mystery deepens: Where is Pratt?’

⁷³⁰⁹ Daily Dispatch, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Could be charged with treason’; The Star, 11 April 1960: 11, ‘When murder could be treason’; Washington Post, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Africa shields assassin’s fate.’

⁷³¹⁰ The Star, 9 April 1966: 1, ‘The Prime Minister is shot.’

⁷³¹¹ The Guardian, 11 April 1960: 6, ‘Dr. Verwoerd’; TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, ‘The assassin of Milner Park.’

The following day, the first claims that Pratt was “mentally unstable” made their appearance in the press.⁷³¹² The police also moved quickly to claim that Pratt was not a member of any political party,⁷³¹³ plainly a falsehood since he was a member of both the South African and the British Liberal Parties. The Deputy Commissioner of Police in the Western Cape, Colonel Terblanche, said in a statement that “the attack on the Prime Minister was not an organised one: it was purely an isolated attack by an individual.”⁷³¹⁴ Six years on, the day after Dr. Verwoerd’s assassination, Minister of Justice and Police John Vorster would make a similar statement, “Present information indicates that it (the assassination) was the deed of one individual, and his actions and movements are being investigated in the finest detail.”⁷³¹⁵

The day after the assassination, Mr. J.C. Pauw, Director of the Union Festival, announced that the Union Exposition would re-open as usual. He said it was the wish of Dr. Verwoerd, his wife and the Government that the programme should continue its normal course.⁷³¹⁶ Two days after the shooting, overseas journalists descended on Marshall Square police station and demanded to know why Pratt had been in the cells for forty-eight hours and had not yet been charged. The Rand chief detective, Col. John Olivier, stated that Pratt was being held under State of Emergency regulations and the State would decide when he would be charged. It was reported that talks were being held between detectives and legal officers about formulating a charge.⁷³¹⁷ Pratt’s visits to his family in Holland were confirmed by a Dutch Justice Ministry spokesman, who said Pratt had been there three times in the last three years. The spokesman also mentioned the time when he was denied entry because he was in possession of a firearm.⁷³¹⁸

Some newspapers predicted that the emergency regulations would now be enforced more strenuously and expressed fears that the shooting would heighten tensions between the National Party’s Dutch-descended Afrikaner supporters and South Africans of British origin.⁷³¹⁹ Indeed, telephone calls were made to two English-language daily newspapers in

⁷³¹² Daily Express, 11 April 1960: 5, ‘The man who shot Dr. Verwoerd.’

⁷³¹³ Ingalls (The New York Times), 11 April 1960, ‘Calm prevailing in South Africa; Dr. Verwoerd gains.’

⁷³¹⁴ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960, 1, ‘Isolated attack, says police chief’; The Cape Times, 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Dr. Verwoerd’; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Dr. Verwoerd moved to Pretoria.’

⁷³¹⁵ The Cape Argus, 7 September 1966 (late edition): 1, ‘Killer was a lone worker.’

⁷³¹⁶ Daily Representative, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘PM may be away for six weeks’; The Cape Times, 11 April 1960: 3, ‘Festival goes on.’

⁷³¹⁷ Die Vaderland, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Speurhoof se staat kan Pratt enige tyd vervolg.’

⁷³¹⁸ The Chicago Daily Defender, 14 April 1960: 4, ‘Gun kept Pratt out of Holland.’

⁷³¹⁹ Philadelphia Tribune, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Farmer’s motive In Dr. Verwoerd shooting cloaked in mystery.’

Johannesburg, the Star and the Rand Daily Mail, threatening to blow up their buildings, and police guards were set on the newspapers for two days.⁷³²⁰ Among many rumours was one that Pratt attacked Dr. Verwoerd without an escape plan because he was mortally ill with a brain tumour. Pratt's sister denied the rumour.⁷³²¹ In economic terms, Pratt's action rattled white public confidence already shaken by the Sharpeville massacre and the introduction of a state of emergency. In a five-month period, shares on the Johannesburg Stock Exchange lost 23% of their value.⁷³²²

The South African police carried out an intensive investigation into the possibility that others were involved with Pratt in the attack. Inquiries were made not only in Johannesburg, but in Cape Town and even within Parliament itself.⁷³²³ However no conspirators were found and on June 11, 1960, the police announced that Pratt had been "absolved of any complicity" in a political plot to kill Dr. Verwoerd and that no other political group or individuals were involved.⁷³²⁴ It should be noted that the transcripts from David Pratt's interrogations by the police, like Tsafendas's, were not found in the National Archives. Therefore we are not in position to know what he told the police.

THE PRESS ON PRATT

THE SOUTH AFRICAN PRESS

The South African Press mostly used negative language in describing Pratt, employing terms such as "unbalanced," "demented," "moody, with psychological problem," "a man of strange moods," an "epileptic." It was reported that he had displayed neurotic and anti-social tendencies from an early age and erratic behaviour which became more noticeable with the years and that only a few people outside of Pratt's immediate acquaintances knew him intimately.⁷³²⁵ Most newspapers highlighted Pratt's epilepsy, his "strange moods," his two ⁷³²⁰ The Canberra Times, 12 April 1960: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd may not recover completely'; Washington Post, 11 April 1960: A8, 'S. Africa speeds action on assassin.'

⁷³²¹ The Canberra Times, 3 May 1960: 1, 'Denial Dr. Verwoerd affected by bullet wound.'

⁷³²² Stultz, 2016: 95.

⁷³²³ Die Vaderland, 4 May 1960: 11, 'Vermetele pogings om Pratt te ontvoer.'

⁷³²⁴ Sunday Times, 12 June 1960: 1, 'Pratt is cleared of political plotting – no conspiracy.'

⁷³²⁵ Die Vaderland, 11 April 1960: 4, 'Pratt was soms gesellig, soms neuroties en onvriendelik'; Cleveland Call and Post, 16 April 1960: 1, 'South African boss survives bullet wounds'; The Cape Times, 11 April 1966, 'Arrested farmer said to be epileptic'; The Cape Times, 11 April 1960, 'Strange whims of man held after the shooting'; Rand Daily Mail, 11 April 1960, 'The enigma that is David Pratt.'

failed marriages and the family problems after the second one. However, as far as the author can establish, there was no mention of his political beliefs or his opposition to apartheid.

An article in the nationalist Die Vaderland highlighted Pratt's switches between sociability and reclusiveness. It wrote that "sometimes ... he was the nicest person imaginable. Then again he was a reclusive man who did not want to talk to anyone for weeks on end." The paper said that at times Pratt would double the amount of money people asked to borrow from him, but at other times, "he would not lend a penny to anyone." The article went on: "Sometimes the social life of Johannesburg would draw him and then he would move in those circles in a light-hearted mood, only to seclude himself in his house again for weeks and even months. It also often happened that he would disappear from his house in the night and then return some time later." Die Vaderland said Pratt would consult with a doctor when depression overtook him.⁷³²⁶

The Cape Times published stories along similar lines, describing Pratt as an enigma who could be charming and friendly when he chose but at other times brusque and morose. It reported that in recent years he had been under treatment at mental institutions for short periods.⁷³²⁷ There were also positive statements about Pratt, how he was a generous man who paid for the sons of several of his friends to complete their education,⁷³²⁸ and that he was kindly and helpful to old people, whether they were English- or Afrikaans-speaking.⁷³²⁹ One description of Pratt was that his personality made him stand out in any gathering.⁷³³⁰ In Holland, Pratt's parents-in-law described him as "an amiable man."⁷³³¹ These positive statements were important in that people were not afraid to speak well of him even though he had just shot South Africa's Prime Minister.

In a God-fearing country, it was quickly reported that he was a regular worshipper at St. Peter's Church, Krugersdorp. Reverend T. Heath, Rector of St. Peter's, said Pratt had confided many problems to him which he could not reveal because of the trust Pratt had placed in him. "Mr. Pratt was very worried lately – his mind was in a state of turmoil," said Rev. Heath. He described Pratt as a "thorough gentleman" and said he never discussed

⁷³²⁶ Die Vaderland, 11 April 1960: 4, 'Pratt was soms gesellig, soms neuroties en onvriendelik.'

⁷³²⁷ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960: 3, 'Man of wealth and whims.'

⁷³²⁸ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960, 'Strange whims of man held after the shooting.'

⁷³²⁹ The Star, 11 April 1960, 'Pratt confided worries to Rector, who respects trust.'

⁷³³⁰ Rand Daily Mail, 11 April 1960: 1, 'The enigma that is Pratt.'

⁷³³¹ Daily Dispatch, 13 April 1960: 1, 'The estranged Mrs. Pratt.'

politics with him. “He was a very generous man and made donations to a large number of charities.”⁷³³²

Father (later Bishop) Reginald Orsmond, the founder and director of Boys’ Town in South Africa, a Christian mission which Pratt supported and visited regularly, said he gained the impression during those encounters that Pratt was deeply upset and looking for something to restore his self-confidence.⁷³³³ He described him as “always very pleasant and very kind to the people at the mission.”⁷³³⁴ Fr. Orsmond would be one of the defence witnesses in the forthcoming trial.

Six year later, shortly after Tsafendas killed Dr. Verwoerd, Alan Paton wrote about Pratt’s assault, “I can remember well the first attempt at assassination, and the public reaction to it. To many people the news was exciting, to some even pleasing.”⁷³³⁵ Of course, no reports of this kind were published at the time.

THE FOREIGN PRESS

News articles around the world gave a completely different picture of Pratt from the one that appeared in South Africa’s newspapers. Although international reports mentioned that Pratt had some psychological problems due to depression caused by his divorce and his epilepsy, no doubts were cast on his sanity. On the contrary, he was presented as perfectly sane. More importantly, he emerged as a man with strong political convictions who despised Dr. Verwoerd and apartheid, a side to his character that remained unknown to newspaper readers in South Africa. Let’s examine these reports.

In Britain, the London Evening Standard of April 11 and the Daily Mirror of April 12 reported that Pratt was a member of the Liberal Party of Great Britain. Both newspapers published a photograph of Pratt with Derek Monsey, a Liberal Party candidate for Parliament, during the British general election of October 1959. The photograph showed them knocking on the door of 10 Downing Street, the residence of the prime minister, thereby taking the expression door-to-door canvassing to its extreme! Pratt was described by the newspapers as ⁷³³² The Star, 11 April 1966: 1, ‘Pratt confided worries to Rector-who respects trust.’

⁷³³³ The Cape Times, 11 April 1960, ‘David Pratt interested in Boys’ Town.’

⁷³³⁴ Sunday Times, 10 April 1960: 1, ‘Arrested man a wealthy Transvaal farmer.’

⁷³³⁵ Paton, 1966: 3.

“a man who helped the Liberals a great deal.”⁷³³⁶ It seems unlikely that Monsey would have taken Pratt to the home of the British prime minister if he had any doubts as to his mental stability and unless he knew him as a trusted party member.

Bruce Hewes, formerly vice-chairman of the Westminster Constituency Liberal Party, said, “I think it is wrong to write Mr. Pratt off as a madman. He was not the sort of chap to go around shouting ‘Down with Dr. Verwoerd.’ He would go and do something about it.” Hewes add that Pratt “helped us a great deal with door-to-door canvassing.” He said, “He didn’t talk very much, but he struck me as being perfectly sane.”⁷³³⁷ Bute Hewes, Bruce’s wife, said Pratt told her a few months earlier that “a lot of us don’t like what is going on in South Africa. But what is the alternative? It’s our country and we just can’t run out on it. It’s our home. But some of us want to see things put straight out there. Apartheid can’t last.”⁷³³⁸

The British newspapers were not the only ones to mention Pratt’s political interests. The New York Times and the Washington Post covered the case extensively through their South Africa-based correspondents. Pratt was described to these two newspapers by a close acquaintance as “a man who hates Nationalists,” and who described Dr. Verwoerd as “the Number One Nationalist.”⁷³³⁹

In different articles in the two newspapers, Pratt was widely described by his friends in South Africa and Britain as “a critic of apartheid,”⁷³⁴⁰ and a “foe of Dr. Verwoerd’s apartheid and race-segregation policies,”⁷³⁴¹ and nursing a “deep antipathy to the governing National Party and its policies.”⁷³⁴² However, none of Pratt’s friends in South Africa would make such comments to the local papers or later at his trial and none of the foreign news reports of Pratt’s political beliefs and activities were carried by South African newspapers.

However, it was not only Pratt’s political activities and ideology that were blanked because of the ban. Numerous foreign reports of a positive nature were withheld from the South African people. In TIME magazine, he was described as a “gentle, kind man who ⁷³³⁶ Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, ‘The day farmer Pratt called at No. 10’; Evening Standard, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Death for gunman?’

⁷³³⁷ Evening Standard, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Death for gunman?’

⁷³³⁸ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.’

⁷³³⁹ The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title; Washington Post, 11 April 1960: A8, ‘S. Africa speeds action on assassin.’

⁷³⁴⁰ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.’

⁷³⁴¹ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Press silence on Pratt ordered’; Washington Post, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Africa shields assassin’s fate.’

⁷³⁴² Ingalls, (The New York Times), 11 April 1960, ‘Calm prevailing in South Africa; Dr. Verwoerd gain.’

collects guns.”⁷³⁴³ The New York Times reported that Pratt had made large donations to poor people the previous Christmas,⁷³⁴⁴ while friends and acquaintances described him variously as “rich, good-looking and cultivated,”⁷³⁴⁵ and “quiet and kindly.”⁷³⁴⁶ People who knew him in Holland described him as “a nice, courteous and very generous man.”⁷³⁴⁷ The TIME magazine also reported that Pratt “hated Dr. Verwoerd’s National Party.”⁷³⁴⁸

Members of the National Liberal Club in London described him as “a gentleman in every way.” Another member considered he was “a reserved chap, the last sort of fellow you would expect to pull a gun on anyone.” Less warmly, someone else described him as “small and aggressive, with an immense sense of his own importance.”⁷³⁴⁹ The Liberal-supporting Fleet Street newspaper, the News Chronicle, quoted a friend of Pratt as saying he was “a very good-hearted gentleman,” who was fond of pistols.⁷³⁵⁰ Another friend said he had some psychological troubles,⁷³⁵¹ while a third described him as “an impulsive man” with some “psychological difficulties.”⁷³⁵² However, no-one questioned Pratt’s sanity.

The Daily Express, using the expression in the non-sexual way of the time, published an article entitled, “A Gay Man,” accompanied by four photographs. Pratt was characterised as a “happy man” and a “sunshine man,” whose home entertainment was “something to remember.”⁷³⁵³ The same newspaper wrote that a few months before the assault, Susan Pratt, told one of its reporters, “my father is the sweetest and gentlest man you could meet. He wouldn’t hurt a fly.”⁷³⁵⁴

Much of the British Press, especially the left wing journals, applauded Pratt’s act. According to Sir William Neil Connor, in his widely read Cassandra column in the Daily Mirror, the majority of Britons were “only disappointed that Pratt did not succeed in killing Dr. Verwoerd.” He wrote that “in fact, such is the bitterness in the minds of the British public

⁷³⁴³ TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, ‘The assassin of Milner Park.’

⁷³⁴⁴ The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title.

⁷³⁴⁵ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.’

⁷³⁴⁶ The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 30, ‘The lesson of South Africa.’

⁷³⁴⁷ The New York Times, 11 April 1960, ‘Pratt described as ‘generous.’

⁷³⁴⁸ TIME, 18 April 1966: 24, ‘The assassin of Milner Park.’

⁷³⁴⁹ The New York Times, 12 April 1960, ‘Enigmatic assassin: David Pratt.’

⁷³⁵⁰ News Chronicle, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Would be assassin: gunman without a cause.’

⁷³⁵¹ The New York Times, 11 April 1960: 3, no title.

⁷³⁵² Ingalls, (The New York Times), 11 April 1960, ‘Calm prevailing in South Africa; Dr. Verwoerd gain.’

⁷³⁵³ Daily Express, 29 April 1960: 9, ‘A gay man.’

⁷³⁵⁴ Daily Express, 14 April 1960: 8, ‘He wouldn’t hurt a fly.’

that when the news came through on Saturday afternoon there were expressions of everything from satisfaction to pleasure - but no regret.”⁷³⁵⁵

The mass-circulation Sunday newspaper, The People, denounced Dr. Verwoerd as a tyrant and described the shooting as “retribution” for his racist policies.⁷³⁵⁶ A week later it attacked Dr. Verwoerd again, stating that he was trying to create through apartheid “a class of work-slaves.”⁷³⁵⁷ The Daily Telegraph expressed surprise that the assailant was White and not Black, which, it said, “would have been understandable.”⁷³⁵⁸

The Observer expressed its sympathy for both Dr. Verwoerd and Pratt, saying, “Personal sympathy for Dr. Verwoerd, who is recovering from an attempt on his life, should be expressed and felt. He carries huge responsibilities and has no doubt done only what he believes to be right. But this should not prevent us from feeling some sympathy for Mr. David Pratt, his would-be assassin, who presumably also did what he believed to be right.” The newspaper went on, “Political assassination is undoubtedly a crime in civilised communities. However, only pacifists have reproached those who made attempts on the lives of Hitler, Mussolini, Stalin and Franco, because these rulers had practised such extravagant injustice and violence themselves... But if he (Dr. Verwoerd) does not treat his governed more fairly, we should not view them and him as without regard to who has been hurting whom. To treat victims and oppressors as morally the same is moral nonsense.”⁷³⁵⁹

The Times called the assault “a dreadful act” and noted that until a few years ago, Pratt was socially prominent in the Johannesburg and Pretoria areas and had the reputation of being an excellent host.⁷³⁶⁰ The left-wing Tribune carried a short comment on its back page, indicating that it had no sympathy for Dr. Verwoerd, but considered that “assassination is an ineffective political weapon.” It said it did not hold the view that it was possible to shoot apartheid out of South Africa by shooting Dr. Verwoerd.⁷³⁶¹

Britain’s oldest political weekly, the Conservative Spectator, found Pratt’s act understandable and justifiable and said it was surprising it had not happened a long time ago. “No dictatorship can behave in the brutal and bloody way that his [Dr. Verwoerd’s] has been ⁷³⁵⁵ Daily Mirror, 11 April 1960: 6.

⁷³⁵⁶ The People, 10 April 1960: 1, ‘V day: two shots and 3000 gasped.’

⁷³⁵⁷ The People, 17 April 1960: 4, ‘He wants a class of work-slaves.’

⁷³⁵⁸ Richards, 1993: 28.

⁷³⁵⁹ The Observer, 17 April 1960: 16, ‘Comment: violence.’

⁷³⁶⁰ The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Dr. Verwoerd moved to Pretoria.’

⁷³⁶¹ Richards, 1993: 29.

doing without eventually leading someone to the conclusion that the simplest way to topple the tyrant is to shoot him dead,” the magazine said. It added that there was a “hideously ironic sense of relief” that the assailant was a white man. “The reaction of the trigger-happy South African authorities against the Black population might, if the shots had been fired by a Black man, have led to a bloodbath beside which Sharpeville would have looked like a Sunday-school picnic.”⁷³⁶²

Vernon Richards, the anarchist editor of Freedom magazine headed his editorial “Too bad he missed,” and he wrote: “Millions of people throughout the world, disgusted by the racial policies of the South African government, will have read the news of the attempt on Dr. Verwoerd with disappointment only because the attempt failed. For them, David Pratt did what they had neither the opportunity nor, in the event, the courage, to do.”⁷³⁶³

Richards then described South Africa as a society “in which the majority is denied the most elementary rights by the ruling minority.” This meant it could only be maintained by naked violence. “Throughout its history, the Black African has invariably been the victim. Last Saturday’s news made a pleasant change. And in sending our condolences and solidarity to David Pratt, who for his gesture is to be detained indefinitely under the Emergency Regulations Laws, we express the hope that no dictator, be he Black, White or Coloured, in Africa, Spain, South America or on either side of the curtain of power, will now sleep in peace!”⁷³⁶⁴

Two weeks later, Freedom published an article, “In defence of David Pratt.” Richards wrote: “That a white South African, a wealthy man, whose wealth and status might well depend on the successful conclusion of Dr. Verwoerd’s apartheid policies, should have been prepared to risk his life or at least his liberty, to exchange his material comforts (which by all accounts were considerable) for confinement in a prison cell in order to make his protest against Dr. Verwoerd and his policies seems to us so unusual, so praiseworthy, that no one professing to radical ideas could possibly ignore the action even if he disagreed with the method... we accept David Pratt’s action as courageous, generous and important to the future of South Africa.” Several readers subsequently sent letters to the magazine, expressing their support for Pratt.⁷³⁶⁵

⁷³⁶² The Spectator, 14 April 1960: 4, ‘Murder will out.’

⁷³⁶³ Richards, 1993: 28.

⁷³⁶⁴ Richards, 1993: 28.

⁷³⁶⁵ Richards, 1993: 29-30.

In the United States, all the big African-American newspapers, like the Atlanta Daily World, the Chicago Daily Defender, the Philadelphia Tribune and the New Journal and Guide, applauded Pratt. The New Journal and Guide carried the banner headline, “Their Hitler Down,”⁷³⁶⁶ while The Chicago Daily Defender, the leading African-American newspaper which is still in print today, praised Pratt lavishly, urged that a monument be raised to him and denounced Dr. Verwoerd as a “blood-thirsty monster.” It wrote: “David Pratt, the white farmer, bless his soul, who fired the three shots that wounded the South African Prime Minister, might have been driven by a divine spirit to put an end to the wanton massacre of helpless Africans. The NAACP (the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured People) should offer its legal services to this man; and a monument should be erected to his name. Whether his motive was political or racial matters little. It cannot be doubted that he was trying to rid the world of a blood-thirsty monster.”⁷³⁶⁷

The weekly New York Amsterdam News, which is also still in existence, published what it called a “Tribute to Pratt.” However, it was also a markedly prophetic piece of writing, the only article in the world Press, as far as the author can establish, which successfully predicted the fate of both Pratt and Dr. Verwoerd. This is what the writer said:

“In memoriam, I offer my sincerest sympathy to anyone who knows and respects David Pratt, the would-be assassin of the hateful South African Prime Minister, Hendrik Dr. Verwoerd. And with all those who have come to feel at least a slight kinship with him since news of his arrest. I, myself rejoice that Pratt was born and lives. He is a great man, and greater still because he was not black. He believed intensely in an idea. But what that idea was, which inspired the will to destroy where destruction and violence has no alternative, we may never know. We can hope, however, that black South Africans will achieve it soon.

It matters not that he didn’t succeed, or that Prime Minister Dr. Verwoerd will rise up again to infest the world, or that the nastiest idea since Hell was created, apartheid, will continue. What does matter is that he has shown it can be done. It must be done. It will be done again. But mercy is only an all too human quality and we know that David Pratt may soon die. We will mourn him, but black men everywhere should be comforted by his memory.”⁷³⁶⁸

⁷³⁶⁶ New Journal and Guide, 16 April 1960: A1, ‘Their Hitler down, S. African racists step up terrorism.’

⁷³⁶⁷ The Chicago Daily Defender, 12 April 1960: 10, ‘Hendrik Dr. Verwoerd: the monster.’

⁷³⁶⁸ New York Amsterdam News, 7 May 1960: 10, ‘Tribute to Pratt.’

THE PRESS SILENCED

On April 11, 1960 in South Africa, two days after the shooting, a news conference for foreign journalists was held by three government ministers: Eric Louw (External Affairs), Francois C. Erasmus (Justice) and J.J. Fouché (Defence). Louw stated that “in this country there is complete freedom of the Press.” He then announced that Norman Phillips, the Canadian foreign editor of the Toronto Daily Star, would be released from custody as soon as the police had finished questioning him, provided he agreed to leave South Africa immediately. Phillips had arrived in Sharpeville just after the massacre but was prevented from entering the township. He said he had seen police violence in Johannesburg, Cape Town, and Durban.⁷³⁶⁹ He had been detained two days earlier in Durban after writing critical stories about apartheid. The Toronto Daily Star reported that Phillips’s dispatches were “uncompromisingly against the Government’s policy of white supremacy.” Justice Minister Erasmus denounced the reports as “absolutely untrue” and ordered his arrest.⁷³⁷⁰ The arrest came shortly after he interviewed Albert Luthuli, who he described as “the only sane man I’ve met since coming here three weeks ago.”⁷³⁷¹ The accusation against Phillips was of writing “reports critical of the government” which could have done serious damage to South African-Canadian relations.⁷³⁷² The Canadian Government protested strongly and demanded Phillips’s immediate release.⁷³⁷³

Only hours after Louw boasted of complete freedom of the Press, the police in Cape Town arrested another foreign journalist, Myrna Mackenzie of the London Daily Herald and the New York Post, who was writing under the name Myrna Blumberg.⁷³⁷⁴ Myrna Mackenzie

⁷³⁶⁹ CBS Archives, available at: <http://www.cbc.ca/archives/entry/sharpeville-massacre-sparks-international-condemnation>; The Cape Argus, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Journalist to be freed-but must leave’; The Star, 11 April 1960: 3, ‘Canada angry over newsman’s arrest’; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Protest over journalist’s arrest.’

⁷³⁷⁰ Daily Express, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Satisfactory’; Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, ‘News girl is seized’; The Cape Argus, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Journalist to be freed-but must leave’; The Spectator, 14 April 1960: 3, ‘Portrait of the week’; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Protest over journalist’s arrest’; The Times (London), 12 April 1960: 12, ‘Dr. Verwoerd still as head of Cabinet.’

⁷³⁷¹ Washington Post, 10 April 1960: 4, ‘South Africa jails newsman.’

⁷³⁷² CBS Archives, available at: <http://www.cbc.ca/archives/entry/sharpeville-massacre-sparks-international-condemnation>; The Cape Argus, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Journalist to be freed-but must leave’; The Star, 11 April 1960: 3, ‘Canada angry over newsman’s arrest’; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Protest over journalist’s arrest.’

⁷³⁷³ The New York Times, 11 April 1960, ‘Dr. Verwoerd aides expect recovery’; The Star, 11 April 1960: 3, ‘Canada angry over newsman’s arrest’; The Times (London), 11 April 1960: 10, ‘Protest over journalist’s arrest.’

⁷³⁷⁴ Alamy (n.d.) Correspondent of the ‘Daily Herald’ Myrna Blumberg is arrested. Available at: <http://www.alamy.com/stock-photo-correspondent-of-the-daily-herald-myrna-blumberg-is-arrested-> was the wife of Ken Mackenzie, manager of Drum and the Post, and both were both reporting on the ANC's strike campaign.⁷³⁷⁵ At this time, too, the editor of Africa South fled the country to avoid arrest.⁷³⁷⁶

On April 12, the day after Louw hailed the freedom of the Press in South Africa, the police banned the media from publishing anything about David Pratt, including his name and photograph, until the end of the Emergency.⁷³⁷⁷ A government official said that this was done "to avoid ill-feeling between the white races,"⁷³⁷⁸ and a police spokesman announced that Pratt "will appear in court at some future date."⁷³⁷⁹ After that, the South African newspapers remained dutifully silent about Pratt until July 7, 1960, the day before he appeared at Pretoria Magistrate's Court.⁷³⁸⁰

Why would the authorities bar the Press from reporting about Pratt? "To avoid ill-feeling between the white races" seems like a lame excuse. It seems more probable that they wanted to prevent the Press and subsequently the public from discovering exactly the sort of man David Pratt was and what political views he held. Reports in the foreign Press contained information about Pratt's life but particularly about his political ideology and political activities, which would certainly not have been welcomed by the South African government. Little of the information published in foreign newspapers was ever reprinted in the South African Press.

CONCLUSION REGARDING THE PRESS

It seems more than likely that the government banned mention of Pratt in South African newspapers because it had seen foreign news reports characterising him positively as highly political and against apartheid and it did not want this picture of him being made available to 69364057.html; Daily Dispatch, 13 April 1960: 1, 'Woman detained-Canadian released'; Daily Express, 12 April 1960: 1, 'Satisfactory'; News Chronicle, 12 April 1960: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd men hold woman reporter'; The Chicago Daily Defender, 13 April 1960: 3, 'South Africa not yielding on race'; The Spectator, 14 April 1960: 3, 'Portrait of the week'; Washington Post, 12 April 1960: 6, 'South Africa widens Emergency Rule.'

⁷³⁷⁵ Vigne, 1997: 120-1; Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, 'News girl seized.'

⁷³⁷⁶ The Spectator, 14 April 1960: 3, 'Portrait of the week.'

⁷³⁷⁷ Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, 'And now he must be called 'nameless''; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Press silence on Pratt ordered'; The New York Times, 7 July 1960: 3, 'Rap South Africa for denying 1600 a trial'; Washington Post, 12 April 1960: 1, 'Africa shields assassin's fate.'

⁷³⁷⁸ News Chronicle, 11 April 1960: 1, 'Dr. Verwoerd is whisked away for operation.'

⁷³⁷⁹ Daily Mirror, 12 April 1960: 5, 'And now he must be called 'nameless''; The New York Times, 12 April 1960, 'Press silence on Pratt ordered'; The New York Times, 7 July 1960: 3, 'Rap South Africa for denying 1600 a trial'; Washington Post, 12 April 1960: 1, 'Africa shields assassin's fate.'

⁷³⁸⁰ The New York Times, 7 July 1960: 3, 'Rap South Africa for denying 1600 a trial.'

South Africans. Knowing that it could not prevent these reports from being picked up by South African newspapers, the government decided to impose a blanket ban on publication.

We should remember that this was 1960, before fax machines and the internet, when newspapers communicated mainly by teleprinter links, telephones and telegrams. The picture of Pratt which emerges from the foreign reports is entirely different to that presented by the South African media, as well as the one which would later emerge from his trial. It seems obvious that the authorities not only wished to suppress the foreign reports but also to prevent South African reporters from making and publishing their own enquiries about Pratt.

Pratt's friends in South Africa told the South African media that Pratt never discussed political issues, but when talking to the foreign press, they told the truth - that he talked about politics like everybody else. It seems unlikely that a man ready to risk his life in an attack on his prime minister would be afraid to express his opinion about the current situation. What seems likelier is that, as in the case of Tsafendas, his friends concealed Pratt's political ideas to protect themselves, while also perhaps thinking this would be safer Pratt, too. Tsafendas's acquaintances who knew about his political ideas, especially his support for Communism, did not mention this to the police because they feared they could be considered sympathizers and asked why they had not reported him to the police as a Communist. It is possible that Pratt's friends thought the same. After all, it cannot be a coincidence that people outside South Africa spoke so freely about Pratt's political ideas and activities, while not a single one did in South Africa.

None of the South African newspapers, as far as the author can ascertain, reported Pratt's political interests or activities, such as his being a member of the South African and British Liberal parties or that he denounced apartheid at party meetings overseas and to his friends in South Africa. Certainly, the photograph of Pratt and a Liberal Party Parliamentary candidate knocking on the door of 10 Downing Street could not have been greater proof of Pratt's political enthusiasms. It also signalled the British party's confidence in Pratt as a known, stable and committed supporter. Such a photograph would have been seized eagerly by any newspaper editor and it must have caused South Africa's news executives much anguish to be told not to touch it under pain of legal sanction.

PRATT'S FRIENDS

One of the most striking aspects of Pratt's case is the way his friends mobilised in his defence and the lengths they went to in order to save his life. Soon after the assault, a friend of Pratt and a member of the Liberal Party in the UK, a certain Mr. Short, visited the Commonwealth Relations Office (C.R.O.) in London several times. A C.R.O. report said he wanted to know if its officers would inquire whether Pratt was receiving a proper trial. He made much of the point that, as he alleged, the United Kingdom Government was prepared to intervene with other governments on behalf of dual nationals where it suited it to do so. The Office told Mr Short that the "matter was sub judice and that it was a settled principle that governments did not seek to intervene in matters which were sub judice." However, it said the C.R.O. "had no information to show that Mr. Pratt's trial would not be completely fair." The dogged Mr. Short did not give up and said that he might "ask a Member of Parliament to ask a question on this subject."⁷³⁸¹

Mr. R.J. Britten of the C.R.O. contacted the Office of the UK High Commissioner in Pretoria regarding Short's inquiry. On August 11, 1960, E.J. Emery replied that, "We agree, of course, with the line you took with your caller ... about matters which are sub judice... considerations of principle apart, Afrikanerdom would react strongly if the United Kingdom Government were to intervene in this particular case."⁷³⁸²

In April, another of Pratt's friends asked the British government for help. Mrs. Olive Roberts from Porthkerry, Barry, south Wales, a member of the British anti-apartheid movement, wrote to her MP, Sir Raymond Gower, "expressing her great anxiety as to the position of her friend, Mr David Pratt, who has been arrested in South Africa." She asked about the conditions where Pratt was held. On April 30, the MP forwarded her letter to the Commonwealth Minister of State, Cuthbert J. McCall Alport.⁷³⁸³

Alport replied on May 5 that "Mr. David Pratt is a citizen of the Union of South Africa and we have, therefore no locus standi to make any enquiries about Mr. Pratt from the ⁷³⁸¹ Report of the Commonwealth Relations Office, 24 June 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

⁷³⁸² Letter of E.J. Emery Office of the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Pretoria to R.J. Britten of the C.R.O. 11 August 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

⁷³⁸³ Letter of Raymond Gower to C.J.M. Alport, 30 April 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

Government of the Union of South Africa, even though he may also be a citizen of the United Kingdom. We know that in these circumstances the Union Government will refuse to give any information about him and I am sorry, therefore, that there is no way in which I can provide the assurance for which Mrs. Roberts asks.”⁷³⁸⁴ It is not clear from the correspondence what “assurances,” Ms Roberts had asked for and her letter was not found in the archives.

Meanwhile, members of the UK anti-apartheid movement, the Labour and Liberal parties collected funds for Pratt’s defence.⁷³⁸⁵ It was no more than a symbolic gesture, since Pratt did not need the money. The Liberal Party and the National Liberal Club almost certainly never had a member who shot a prime minister, yet both adopted a supportive stance towards Pratt. It is unlikely that they would have done so if they had any doubts as to his mental stability or the sincerity of his political convictions.⁷³⁸⁶

Pressure for diplomatic intervention was only one aspect of Pratt’s support. As we will later see, some of Pratt’s friends in South Africa would be involved in at least three escape plans, risking their freedom, indeed their lives, on his behalf. Other friends agreed to testify in court in support of an insanity plea orchestrated by the defence and Pratt’s daughter which they knew to be a lie. They exaggerated and manipulated stories to give credence to something they knew was not true, in an effort to save their friend. Such extraordinary loyalty, indeed affection, could never have been extended to someone who was mentally disordered and without political concerns.

PRATT’S DEFENCE TEAM

The firm of attorneys, Dryden⁷³⁸⁷ & Myburgh, which was handling Pratt’s affairs, appointed a well-known advocate, Israel (Isie) Maisels, to defend Pratt. Frank Ninow, his junior, was briefed along with him.⁷³⁸⁸ Dryden & Myburgh, in agreement with Pratt’s family and friends, decided to mount a defence of insanity, believing that this “would give him a more lenient ⁷³⁸⁴ Letter of C.J.M. Alport to Raymond Gower, 5 May 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

⁷³⁸⁵ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, NASA.

⁷³⁸⁶ Michael Meadowcroft in a personal interview, 2 February 2017.

⁷³⁸⁷ Three years later, Hilton Dryden, one of the partners of the company, was found shot dead in his house with a pistol in his hand (The New York Times, 15 November 1963, ‘Dr. Verwoerd’s foe’s lawyer dead’).

⁷³⁸⁸ Maisels, 1998: 102.

punishment.”⁷³⁸⁹ However, before any trial could start, the law required that if a person charged or about to be charged with a crime appeared to be mentally disordered, an enquiry must first be held into his mental condition.⁷³⁹⁰ Pratt himself disagreed with a defence of insanity, protesting that it undermined the seriousness of his action against Dr. Verwoerd. Despite the protests of his daughter, who feared for his life, Pratt was unmoved and unwilling to plead insanity.⁷³⁹¹

ISRAEL MAISELS'S SHORT BIOGRAPHY⁷³⁹²

Israel (Isie) Aaron Maisels QC (1905-1994) was one of the greatest advocates in the history of South Africa. Maisels started practice at the Bar in 1930 and retired from it in 1992, aged eighty-seven. He is best known for the Treason Trial, widely considered to be his greatest triumph. The trial began in 1958 and ran for almost three years. A total of ninety-two prisoners were arraigned, among them Nelson Mandela, Walter Sisulu, Ahmed Kathrada and Helen Joseph. Maisels's defence team, which included several distinguished lawyers, secured verdicts of “not guilty” for all the accused.⁷³⁹³ Maisels also represented Bishop Reeves and some dependents at the Sharpeville Commission of Inquiry.⁷³⁹⁴ He was one of the two members of a committee appointed by the Medical Association of South Africa to investigate the medical/ethical issues arising from the death in police detention in 1977 of Steve Biko. Maisels was also active in South Africa's Jewish community, being at different times president of the United Hebrew Congregation, chairman of the South African Zionist Federation, and chairman of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies.⁷³⁹⁵

PRATT IN PRISON

JOHANNESBURG FORT

Pratt was transferred from Marshall Square police station to the Johannesburg Fort prison with the intention that he should remain there, under the Emergency Regulations, until he ⁷³⁸⁹ Susan Pratt in a personal interview, 3 May 2015.

⁷³⁹⁰ Maisels, 1998: 102.

⁷³⁹¹ Guy Spiller in a personal interview, 8 December 2016.

⁷³⁹² For more about Maisels see his biography (1998) A life at Law.

⁷³⁹³ South African Law Journal, 1995: 132-135.

⁷³⁹⁴ The Star, 12 April 1960: 1, ‘Official inquiry starts: Policemen describe Sharpeville events.’

⁷³⁹⁵ South African Law Journal, 1995: 132-135.

appeared in Pretoria Magistrate's Court.⁷³⁹⁶ The disruption to this plan is explained in the following paragraphs. Pratt was given tablets at two-hourly intervals to ward off the effects of epilepsy.⁷³⁹⁷

ESCAPE PLANS

It seems that Pratt always had an eye towards flight and at least three escape plans or attempts have been recorded. During the last week of April 1960, police uncovered a plan by some of Pratt's friends to engineer his escape from the Fort prison and then fly him out of the country. An airplane stood ready and the friends tried to bribe some of Pratt's guards. When the plot was discovered, Pratt was removed from the Fort under the strictest secrecy to an unknown destination, which in fact was the Pretoria Local Prison.⁷³⁹⁸

The Witwatersrand criminal investigation chief, Colonel John Olivier, did not deny reports of the escape attempt, but declined to comment on them.⁷³⁹⁹ Several months later, as we will see in detail, Pratt would temporarily escape on his own, where again another airplane was waiting for him. Shortly before his trial, a new plot was initiated, also involving an airplane, but Pratt's advocate, Israel Maisels, refused to be part of it.

The author has not been able to establish who was involved in these attempts, but mention might be made of Tommy Griffiths, who lived in Bloemfontein. Griffiths was a friend of Pratt and of his business partner, John Spiller. He was a pilot and owned a small airplane.⁷⁴⁰⁰ It is not possible to state that Griffiths was involved in any escape plan, but it may be germane that all of the proposed escapes involved the use of an airplane to fly Pratt to safety.

The fact that Pratt's friends were willing to risk their freedom, possibly their lives, on Pratt's behalf speaks volumes for the respect and affection in which they held him. Their attitude gives the lie to the State's preferred description of Pratt as someone without any close friends. It is highly unlikely that these men would go to the lengths they did for someone they

⁷³⁹⁶ Daily Dispatch, 9 July 1960, 'David Pratt in Pretoria Court.'

⁷³⁹⁷ Daily Express, 29 April 1960: 9, 'A gay man.'

⁷³⁹⁸ Die Vaderland, 4 May 1960: 11, 'Vermetele pogings om Pratt te ontvoer'; The Canberra Times, 6 May 1960: 24, 'Plot to kidnap Pratt alleged.'

⁷³⁹⁹ The Canberra Times, 6 May 1960: 24, 'Plot to kidnap Pratt alleged.'

⁷⁴⁰⁰ Guy Spiller in a personal interview, 7 February 2017.

scarcely knew or who they thought might be insane. Nor would they have acted if they believed that he could get away by pleading insanity.

PRETORIA LOCAL PRISON

In Pretoria Local Prison, Pratt was reunited with Joe Slovo and other anti-apartheid activists who had already been moved there. However, he was barred from direct contact with all but one detainee, Reverend Douglas Thompson, also a political detainee. The two played chess once under an arrangement by a compassionate warder.⁷⁴⁰¹

For some time, Pratt was allowed to exercise with other prisoners. He promptly turned the exercise yard into a military parade ground and organised the younger prisoners into a soldierly squad which he marched up and down while barking orders like a sergeant major. The youngsters were quickly dubbed “Pratt’s Army” and seemed to enjoy this break from prison routine. The prison guards looked on, amused. After a while, however, the prison bosses seemed to grow nervous at the sight of an alleged political assassin controlling his own little army and the parade ground drills ended and Pratt was made to exercise on his own. Joe Slovo wrote that one day, “out of desperation for human company or a desire to make a gesture of political unity,” Pratt dashed across the yard into the political prisoners’ section, and he stayed there for a few minutes, shouting greetings, until the warders removed him.⁷⁴⁰²

Slovo and the other “politicals” often made a point to convene their choir when Pratt began his half-hour spell in the exercise yard. This led to a moment Slovo said he would never forget.⁷⁴⁰³

“Pratt’s image is fixed in my memory by a moment during one of our choir practices. We were rehearsing the rather melancholy refrain Drink to me only with thine eyes. Pratt, surrounded by warders, stood motionless, as close to our window as they would allow, body slumped, hands in pocket and tears uncontrollably cascading down his cheeks, making not the slightest attempt to hide them or to wipe them off. A few days later he left an exercise

⁷⁴⁰¹ Slovo, 1995: 132.

⁷⁴⁰² Slovo, 1995: 133.

⁷⁴⁰³ Slovo, 1995: 132-133.

book for us in the lavatory complex. It contained very elaborate and fanciful exhortations for joint efforts against racism.”⁷⁴⁰⁴

Pratt was allowed outside his cell for exercise only twice a day for thirty-minute spells. Each time he returned, he collected his sugar ration and on the way back he would spill a little sugar on the ground so that the warders’ footsteps would be clearly heard as they crunched over the grains. This gave him time “to disconnect and hide home-made water heaters from primitive coils or copper wire, dagga, brandy, which was smuggled through in Coca-Cola bottles, and anything else illegal with which the cells abounded.”⁷⁴⁰⁵

A nephew of Pratt, who visited him several times in prison, said his uncle was abused regularly.⁷⁴⁰⁶ On one occasion, he wore an eye-shield to hide a black eye. The official version was that it happened during a fight with an inmate.⁷⁴⁰⁷ The truth was that Pratt was targeted most heavily by warders, who considered him a traitor, while inmates themselves were always ready for a fight. Sometimes, the warders provoked Pratt’s fellow prisoners into attacking him. As with Tsafendas, the prison officers felt it was their duty to punish the man who had attempted to kill their God.⁷⁴⁰⁸ However, unlike Tsafendas, Pratt was not tortured. This may have been because he was a prominent South African with a high-profile defence counsellor in Maisels, who would protest if his client was mistreated, unlike Bloomberg, who failed to intervene on behalf of Tsafendas. Pratt also had regular visitors and his family stood by him, whereas Tsafendas received no outside support.

Nevertheless, Pratt was not angry with the warders and even felt a little sorry for them. In a letter to his friend Desmond Blow he wrote, “The warders’ life was not to be envied. Essentially it was that of the prisoner. His pay was poor, his hours long and the work without satisfaction. As a result, naturally, the more stupid and sadistic section of the community tended to drift towards this work, but there were exceptions.”⁷⁴⁰⁹

One of the exceptions was Sgt. van de Lingen, a twenty-three-year-old head warder who was studying Law. Pratt and van den Lingen shared a careful relationship, with the head warder “opening out” to him a little during his “special solitary exercise periods.” One ⁷⁴⁰⁴ Slovo, 1995: 133.

⁷⁴⁰⁵ David Pratt letter to Desmond Blow, n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴⁰⁶ Maisels, 1998: 327.

⁷⁴⁰⁷ Rand Daily Mail, 3 October 1961, ‘Pratt’s suicide did not surprise his friends.’

⁷⁴⁰⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁴⁰⁹ David Pratt letter to Desmond Blow, n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

morning when the two were alone in the washrooms, van de Lingen told Pratt, "Every man has his price. If I thought I could get £30,000, I would be quite prepared to serve three years, but not for less." Pratt "looked at him for a few seconds" and then the sergeant's eyes "wandered away." "Did he really think he could hook me with such a gaudy fly?" Pratt wondered, spotting the bait. He thought this was probably a set-up aiming to get him into more trouble and that van de Lingen "had his instructions from higher up." Pratt replied that "£30,000 was chicken feed, and if he really wanted crime he should not think in lesser terms than six figures." He also argued that "the sentences, in any event, were frequently less for stealing a million than a hundred. The public also rather liked the big crook but hated the petty pilferer."⁷⁴¹⁰

One day, van de Lingen confided to Pratt that money belonging to some political detainees which was kept in the prison reception area had been stolen. Pratt already knew about this from the "prisoners' grapevine." When, the warders began questioning the common criminals, i.e. the non-politicals, Pratt told van den Lingen, "What use would convicts have with cash? Look among your own staff; that's more promising ground."⁷⁴¹¹

Pratt made discreet inquiries and discovered which of the political prisoners had lost money. Assuming they needed cash, Pratt left a note offering his help on the top of the latrine where messages were exchanged. The politicals sent messages by return, thanking him for his offer, but assuring him that they were all right for funds at the moment. Eventually, van de Lingen and his superiors followed Pratt's advice and interrogated the prison staff. The delay gave time for the assistant head-warder, Sgt. Roos, who had worked in this prison for thirty-six years, to flee to Europe, taking all the money with him.⁷⁴¹²

PRATT'S LETTER TO DR. VERWOERD

While in prison and still under the Emergency Regulations, Pratt's mind was constantly on political developments in South Africa. At one point, he wrote the following letter to Dr. Verwoerd:

⁷⁴¹⁰ David Pratt letter to Desmond Blow, n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴¹¹ David Pratt letter to Desmond Blow, n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴¹² David Pratt letter to Desmond Blow, n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

Dear Dr. Verwoerd,

By now you will have had time to contemplate on the vast inarticulate majority of South Africans who are bitterly opposed to the policies you have been pursuing with such utter ruthlessness.

It is not my intention to talk politics, but when you stated in the House that force will be met with greater force, I wondered where this would end. Every human being has a basic dignity, and when you attempt to destroy this, you come up against the force of God.

In Europe, I spent much time defending the policies of your government. On my return, however, the deterioration which had taken place during my absence struck me with great force. The hopelessness in faces, the fear to talk, and amongst the weaker ones, liquidation at any price and get out.

The present situation of emergency will not subside unless you take positive steps to ease it. That means being a Christian and swallowing your pride. I don't think you are able to do this. If you can, you are a bigger man than I think.

In any event, as a doctor of philosophy, you will know that it is better for a man to die for a principle than to live in contradiction thereto. Consequently, though you need give no thought to me personally, remember I am just one of this inarticulate mass to which I referred at the beginning of my letter.

*David Pratt*⁷⁴¹³

There is nothing in Pratt's letter to suggest that he is mentally disordered; it contains nothing inaccurate, outlandish or violent. On the contrary, the letter is well-written, makes a series of cogent political arguments and expresses a deep concern for the future of South Africa. Pratt expresses his solidarity with the masses opposed to Dr. Verwoerd, sets out his disappointment at the deterioration of conditions in the country, hints at the desperation he felt on hearing Dr. Verwoerd's determination to meet force with force and affirms his readiness to die in defence of his principles. A sense of sympathy for the nation's oppressed pervades his five paragraphs.

⁷⁴¹³ Guy Spiller's 'The Liberal and the Pirate.' 1999.

PRATT'S FIRST APPEARANCE IN THE COURT

On July 7, 1960, almost three months after the shooting, Pratt's name reappeared in the South African press for the first time since April 12 when the ban on references to him was imposed. The Rand Daily Mail announced that Pratt would be taken to court for the first time on July 20 for a preparatory examination.⁷⁴¹⁴ However, it was actually the next day, July 8, when Pratt made an unexpected and unannounced first appearance at Pretoria Magistrate's Court for a formal remand.⁷⁴¹⁵

The building was surrounded by policemen and Pratt was brought there secretly, handcuffed to a detective. Pratt appeared before the Chief Magistrate of Pretoria, Mr. F.C.A. Wessel, for a preparatory examination of an allegation of attempted murder. The Acting Attorney-General of Transvaal, R.W. Rein, Q.C., requested that the case be postponed until July 20, when a preparatory examination would be held in Pretoria, expected to last two days. Wessel so ruled.⁷⁴¹⁶ Nine days after Pratt's court appearance, his personal driver, Jan Hendricks, a thirty-nine-year-old Coloured man, was punched in the face by a White man on Pratt's farm.⁷⁴¹⁷

THE PREPARATORY EXAMINATION

On July 20, Pratt appeared at Pretoria Magistrate's Court for the agreed preparatory examination. It was the first time in the history of South Africa that a person had appeared in court in connection with the attempted murder of a political figure.⁷⁴¹⁸ Opening the Crown case was Mr. R.W. Rein, Q.C, who was assisted by Mr. K.D.M. Moodie. Israel Maisels was assisted by Mr. F. Ninow, with W.S. McEwan present as Curator ad litem.⁷⁴¹⁹ Mr. Rein said

⁷⁴¹⁴ Rand Daily Mail, 7 July 1960, 'Pratt to come before Court on July 20.'

⁷⁴¹⁵ Sunday Times, 10 July 1960: 13, 'Dr. Verwoerd saved from ordeal at the Pratt inquiry'; The Cape Times, 20 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt inquiry opens in Pretoria today'; The New York Times, 9 July 1960, 'Dr. Verwoerd attacker in Court'; The Times (London), 9 July 1960: 4, 'Pratt remanded again'; The Star, 9 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt makes quick court appearance.'

⁷⁴¹⁶ Sunday Times, 10 July 1960: 13, 'Dr. Verwoerd saved from ordeal at the Pratt inquiry'; The Cape Times, 20 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt inquiry opens in Pretoria today'; The New York Times, 9 July 1960, 'Dr. Verwoerd attacker in Court'; The Times (London), 9 July 1960: 4, 'Pratt remanded again'; The Star, 9 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt makes quick court appearance.'

⁷⁴¹⁷ Sunday Times, 17 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt's driver is assaulted at farm.'

⁷⁴¹⁸ The Cape Times, 20 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt inquiry opens in Pretoria today.'

⁷⁴¹⁹ A curator ad litem is the person, usually an advocate, appointed by the court to investigate the mental condition of someone whose mental capability is in question (Maisels, 1998: 327).

that he would proceed with the evidence of eyewitnesses of the shooting, without revealing what evidence the Crown proposed to lead.⁷⁴²⁰

The first two witnesses were Col. Geoffrey Harrison, a consulting architect and president of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society, and Alec Gorshel, the Mayor of Johannesburg. Both recognised Pratt as Dr. Verwoerd's assailant and described the shooting. Gorshel said Pratt had a "strained smile" on his face as he shot Dr. Verwoerd.⁷⁴²¹

Subsequently, four more witnesses testified for the prosecution; all described the shooting, recognising Pratt as the assailant. They were Mr. J. Esterhuizen, a designer and artist who was sitting near Dr. Verwoerd at the time, Mr. John Mansell Evans, deputy President of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society, Mr. Charles Hames Laubscher, former general manager of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society, and Det. Head-Cons. Koekemoer, of Marshall Square Police Station. Pratt smiled from the dock when Koekemoer stated that Pratt was manhandled by members of the public.⁷⁴²²

The examination concluded the following day, July 21, with a session that lasted only eight minutes. Only one witness was called by the Crown, Dr. Joseph Lannon, a surgeon who attended Dr. Verwoerd immediately after the shooting. He described the prime minister's injuries and how he had treated them.⁷⁴²³ When Dr. Lannon's testimony ended, the prosecutor pleaded formally that Pratt be ordered to stand trial on a charge of attempting to murder Dr. Verwoerd. Mr. Wessel, the Magistrate, addressing the prisoner, said, "I want to explain to you, Pratt, that you are not obliged to say anything now. If you do, it may be used in evidence against you." Pratt, looking calm and composed, replied, "Your Worship, at this stage I have decided to say nothing and I reserve my defence." Wessel then told Pratt and that his remarks had been recorded and he replied, "Good." Pratt then accepted "short-service," meaning that he was prepared to stand trial at any time, and signed the indictment with his recorded decision. He was asked whether he wished to be tried by a judge or by a judge and jury since ⁷⁴²⁰ Indictment in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt. Charged: attempted murder. 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴²¹ Testimony of Col. Geoffrey Merchant Harrison in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Testimony of Alec Gorshel in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 20 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴²² Rand Daily Mail, 21 July 1960: 1, 3, 'Pratt smiled at humour in court'; The Cape Argus, 20 July 1960, 'Pratt inquiry evidence'; The Cape Times, 21 July 1960: 5, 'Witnesses described shooting of Dr. Verwoerd'; The Times (London), 21 July 1960: 10, 'Pratt in court in Dr. Verwoerd attack charge.'

⁷⁴²³ Testimony of Dr. Joseph Lannon in the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 21 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

South African law gave these options to a person accused of a capital offence.⁷⁴²⁴ Pratt would later elect to go for trial by jury.⁷⁴²⁵

AFTER THE PREPARATORY EXAMINATION

On August 22, Patricia Pratt arrived in South Africa from Europe for a ten-day stay⁷⁴²⁶ and met with her husband and his lawyers. When the defence team asked her to testify in court, she agreed, but changed her mind⁷⁴²⁷ when she found out about the insanity plea. She did not believe he was insane and felt that as a devout Catholic, she could not lie on oath. Angered by his defence team's plans for an insanity plea, Pratt also asked her not to support the defence line and she agreed.⁷⁴²⁸ On August 24, she made clear to reporters that she would not attend or testify at Pratt's trial, but would visit her husband in prison and attend to family affairs.⁷⁴²⁹

On September 2, Patricia spoke openly at a news conference about her relationship with Pratt. She said she "wished to dispel any suggestion that there had been any estrangement between me and my husband," and said she was "happy to announce that there is a complete understanding between us." As for their two children, she said they knew nothing about their father's case as she did not feel it would be right to tell them. However, she said, "Someone will have to tell them eventually."⁷⁴³⁰ Mrs Pratt said she planned to return permanently to South Africa soon. Two days later, she flew back to Holland and did not attend the trial.⁷⁴³¹

⁷⁴²⁴ Conclusion of the preparatory examination in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 21 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Daily Dispatch, 21 July 1960, 'Pratt committed for trial'; Daily Express, 22 July 1960: 2, 'Farmer Pratt for trial'; Daily Representative, 21 July 1960: 1, 'David Pratt sent for trial'; Rand Daily Mail, 22 July 1960, 'Relatives see Pratt after hearing'; The Cape Argus, 21 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt sent for trial in Dr. Verwoerd shooting'; The Cape Times, 22 July 1960: 13, 'Pratt will not be tried till September'; The Guardian, 22 July 1960: 11, 'Pratt sent for trial'; The New York Times, 22 July 1960, 'South Africa trial set.' The Star, 21 July 1960: 1, 'Pratt sent for trial as inquiry ends swiftly.'

⁷⁴²⁵ Dryden and Myburgh letter to the Magistrate informing him of David Pratt's decision for Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 29 July 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴²⁶ The Star, 27 August 1960: 3, 'Mrs. Pratt faces the press'; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, 'Mental health of Pratt.'

⁷⁴²⁷ Maisels, 1998: 103-104.

⁷⁴²⁸ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴²⁹ Letter by E.J. Emery of the Office of the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Pretoria to the Commonwealth Relations Office in London. 24 August 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

⁷⁴³⁰ Reuter, IS1154. 2 September 1960. Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. BNA.

⁷⁴³¹ Sunday Times, 11 September 1960, 'Mrs. Pratt plans to live in S.A.'; The Star, 27 August 1960: 3, 'Mrs. Pratt faces the press'; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, 'Mental health of Pratt.'

The trial was set for September 12, 1960. Pratt's daughter Susan, other family members, his friends and his defence team tried assiduously to convince him to go along with an insanity plea, but to no avail. Indeed, their efforts angered Pratt because he considered that a plea of insanity would undermine the integrity of his act, which he committed, he said, for valid and important reasons. He threatened to dismiss his defence team and appoint new ones if they continued to press their case.⁷⁴³² Eventually, Pratt did just that, jettisoning Dryden & Myburgh.⁷⁴³³

PRATT'S LETTER TO DESMOND BLOW

During the court proceedings, Pratt met Desmond Blow, a journalist for the Sunday Times, and they took a liking to each other. Later, out of personal interest, Blow visited Pratt several times in the prison and the hospital and they became very close. Blow gained Pratt's confidence and the two spent hours talking together. Blow became "very fond" of Pratt and "admired him very much." He had "high regard" for Pratt's "principles" and found him to be "a sane man" with "a brilliant mind."⁷⁴³⁴

The following is a letter from Pratt to Blow when Pratt was in prison:

"It's what you see with your eyes and hear with your ears that teaches you about criminals," said the assistant head warder, Sgt. Roos, 'not what you read in books or welfare reports. I've been here 36 years and have not yet seen a criminal reform. But he'll always have a story and sometimes he deceives the cleverest judges in the land. Then he comes back with a laugh and says: 'Well, I pulled it off again. Never trust one of them.'

Sgt. Roos pulled on his pipe and leaned back in his chair, 'Thank God we've got rid of these monitors too. Lousy bunch of lazy scroungers. Now they're paying for the brandy they smuggled in. Twenty-one days isolation on bread and water', Roos smiled sadistically but said nothing about the chief offence these monitors were suffering for. Four months ago a portable radio had arrived for Major Langebrink and the monitor in the receiving office just took it to their cell and plugged it into the light with a two-way fitting bought quite openly on ⁷⁴³² Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017; Sue Charter and Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁴³³ Maisels, 1998: 102; Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017; Guy Spiller in a personal interview, 8 December 2016.

⁷⁴³⁴ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Elizabeth Blow in a personal interview, 26 October 2017.

his 'grocery' order. Correspondence and argument with the radio shop had gone on continuously and the major on his periodic rounds had even admired the monitor's radio.

As always happens in jails, information leaked but on this occasion it leaked to the radio shop. It would take the commissioned ranks and the warders quite a while to get over the indignity of an outside shop piercing their inefficiency. As usual, their only solace was to use the big stick.

I was charged with attempted murder and had been messed around for over four months. The trouble was that I had tried to shoot the Prime Minister as the country as a whole certainly didn't want him and there seemed no other way to get rid of him, and nobody now quite knew what to do with me, As a result I had been in isolation cells in three different prisons, and came out for 30 minutes exercise morning and afternoon with the 'prisoners awaiting trial'. Naturally this constituted a ragged flotsam of society that was unable to pay bail. They lay about in ragged pieces of clothing, making plans to smuggle in a bit of dagga, the smoking of which constituted their Utopia and also, in most cases, their crime. Lauson was a type you could recognise the world over. I've seen the typical horsy woman, the goat breeder, the fowl fanatic and the pig producer. More times than not you can guess the occupation, but with Lauson it was a certainty.

Therefore I opened the conversation casually when we met in the latrines during the 30 minute exercise period. 'Were you with Doves or Wilmots', I asked, 'or one of the smaller ones'? 'Wilmots' he answered with pride. 'I was in charge of Port Shepstone. Mind you, I was originally only the mortician, but Mr. Wesaels couldn't find a suitable successor for the office after Keens died, so I agreed to take it all on.'

He was in for fraud involving under £500. The burial societies were now having the coffins stripped before cremation and so saving £10 per funeral. This had been gazetted but Lauson had gone on charging until an insurance company had written him a letter asking why. He had replied saying it was a mistake and enclosing the £10. Then the letters piled in but of course he couldn't return it all. 'Why didn't you pack your bags and go?' I asked. 'Yes', he said, 'I should have done, but there was a lot of work inside the mortuary at the time and I had no one to take over. I wasn't really interested in the office anyway!'

Blackie was a lanky scruffy-haired piece of jetsam whose body was a walking art gallery. He specialised in nude tattoos, varying from a buxom wench on his back stretching from neck to pelvis, to delicate damsels of only a few inches in length lying seductively down his forearms. His pupils showed the dilations of a typical dagga addict and he was in for knife fighting after the usual smoke.

This pathetic batch of driftwood varied in number from under ten to over twenty, and lay around the high walled exercise yard or scrubbed a bit of tattered clothing on the grey slate by the cold water tap.

The one point on which all agreed was that the warders were a batch of bastards. They behaved towards them with the servility of the Coloureds to the compound police, but underneath lay the same hatred and frustration. The warders' life was not to be envied. Essentially it was that of the prisoner. His pay was poor, his hours long and the work without satisfaction. As a result, naturally, the more stupid and sadistic section of the community tended to drift towards this work, but there were exceptions. Sgt. van de Lingen was only 23 and already a head warder. His interests lay in studying criminal humanity and drawing them, 'Every man has his price', he told me one morning when we were alone in the wash-rooms, 'If I thought I could get £30,000, I would be quite prepared to serve three years, but not for less'. I looked at him for a few seconds and then his eyes wandered away. Did he really think he could hook me with such a gaudy fly? Still, I suppose he had his instructions from higher up, I told him £30,000 was chicken feed, and if he really wanted crime he should not think in lesser terms than six figures. The sentences, in any event, were frequently less for stealing a million than a hundred. The public also rather liked the big crook but hated the petty pilferer. He was studying to be an attorney and intended to specialise in crime. His rapid promotion through his relative intelligence had earned the jealousy of the older warders and he had few friends in the prison. That was probably the reason why he started opening out to me a little when I had special solitary exercise periods.

'There's a revolt in the office over the detainees' cash', he volunteered one morning. This I had already heard along the prisoners' grape vine, for nothing is secret in a prison. The detainees were the more positive free thinking men in S. Africa, who had been arrested at their homes in the early hours following the promulgation of Emergency Regulations by the Nationalist Government, Several were well-to-do men who had brought considerable sums of money with them, all of which was now kept at the prison reception. One or two had been unexpectedly released and on checking out had found their money gone. After this a check had been made with the whole group and the missing cash ran into some hundreds. Now the Colonel was leading the investigation and suspicion, of course, fell on the monitors also.

They were confined to isolation cells on short rations and questioned daily with all the usual tricks, but no results had so far been achieved, 'What use would convicts have with cash?'

I asked van de Lingen, 'Look among your own staff; that's more promising ground'.

'That's the monitors story' he laughed, 'but one used to go on messages to town and could easily have smuggled it out. However, we'll find it, or find who took it, anyway.

Solitary breaks them down sooner or later.'

I collected my sugar ration on the way back and spilt a little over the passage floor of my agreed section, so that when we were locked in the warders' footsteps could be heard more clearly as he crunched over them on cell inspection. This gave time to disconnect and hide home-made water heaters from primitive coils or copper wire, dagga, brandy which was smuggled through in Coca Cola bottles, and anything else illegal with which the cells abounded. Back inside, I made up my bed from the blanket radio and settled down to read quietly. My thoughts, however, kept wandering to the detainees cash and I got up and wrote them a note to leave next day on the top of the latrine we used for exchanging messages.

Within a few days things began to happen. Investigations changed from the monitors to the officials, but the Colonel was not quick enough. Sgt. Roos vanished with enough money to buy a ticket to Europe and start afresh. As he should have said: "It's what you see with your eyes and hear with your ears that teaches you to become a criminal". Though it taught him the principles he didn't have the natural finesse which you can't learn from a book either."

SUSAN PRATT'S APPLICATION REGARDING HER FATHER'S MENTAL CONDITION

On September 2, 1960, with Pratt still unwilling to accept the insanity plea, Susan initiated a desperate attempt to save her father's life. She formally requested the Witwatersrand Supreme Court, in accordance with the terms of the Mental Disorders Act, to order an inquiry into her father's mental condition. Her application said she considered such an order "essential in her father's interests and to avoid a miscarriage of justice."⁷⁴³⁵ She said that for as long as she could remember, her father had serious psychological problems and had undergone treatment several times. She argued that her father's wish to withhold evidence of his medical condition from the court indicated that he was unable to appreciate the seriousness of his situation and lacked the judgment necessary to manage his affairs or give proper instructions to his lawyers. She said that when she visited her father, he appeared to be in "a sort of a dream and quite unaware of the allegations against him."⁷⁴³⁶

⁷⁴³⁵ Susan Pratt's ex parte application. Susan Diane Pratt, 6000/60. NASA; Daily Representative, 3 September 1960: 1, 'Pratt's daughter calls for mental inquiry.'

What Susan said in her application about her father's treatment for psychological issues was true. However, in truth she did not consider him to be mentally disordered. The application was an attempt to force her father to accept the insanity plea or at least to have some doctors examine him. Susan and the defence team believed they had a strong case because of Pratt's epilepsy and periods of depression. Further, they believed doctors who had treated her father were sympathetic towards him and critical of apartheid.⁷⁴³⁷

Annexed to the petition were medical opinions from Dr. Chesler, Dr. Jacobson, Dr. Friedman and Prof. Hurst, all of whom had examined Pratt and concluded that he was not fit to stand trial. Susan was told by her father's legal advisers that they were making no progress in persuading him to have his defence conducted properly. Appearing at Witwatersrand Supreme Court, Susan's counsel said of Pratt, "He is unable to appreciate the seriousness of his situation and lacks the judgments necessary to manage his own affairs." At this, Pratt, appearing cool and calm, looked around the courtroom with a faint smile on his face.⁷⁴³⁸

In a reply to Judge Galgut, who was trying the case, Pratt said he was perfectly capable of handling his own affairs. "It is my intention to place all necessary, relevant psychiatric evidence before the trial judge. If it is the wish of the applicant to have the trial adjourned and that I be admitted for further observation, I would be prepare to submit myself," said Pratt. He also stated that he had seen the text of the application only about a quarter of an hour before and asked that the matter be postponed until he had an opportunity to get legal representation.⁷⁴³⁹

Mr. C. Margo, Q.C., for Susan Pratt, reminded the Court that Pratt's attorney had informed him that he was no longer acting for Pratt and said, "Pratt should be advised that he

⁷⁴³⁶ Susan Pratt's ex parte application. Susan Diane Pratt, 6000/60. NASA; Sunday Times, 11 September 1960, 'Susan Pratt: My father is in a sort of dream.'

⁷⁴³⁷ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴³⁸ Daily Mail, 3 September 1960: 6, 'My sick father-by Pratt's daughter'; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, 'Mental health of Pratt.'

⁷⁴³⁹ The Cape Argus, 3 September 1960: 7, 'Pratt says he can handle his own affairs'; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, 'Mental health of Pratt.'

has no attorney. All I ask is that the court appoint a curator ad litem.”⁷⁴⁴⁰ He also read a psychiatric report where it was stated that Pratt was “no doubt an epileptic and a megalomaniac which absolved him from criminal responsibility.” The judge refused to hear any anything further about the case and postponed the hearing for three days so that Pratt could read the documents and seek legal representation.⁷⁴⁴¹ Subsequently Pratt appointed another attorney, Benno Tennet, who added another advocate, Leslie Lawrence, S.C., to the team of Maisels and Ninow.⁷⁴⁴²

The following day, September 3, Pratt's second wife, Patricia, who was about to return to Holland, applied to the Witwatersrand Supreme Court, for leave to intervene in Susan Pratt's application and through her counsel asked that if the application were granted, she should be allowed to nominate her attorney as another curator ad litem.⁷⁴⁴³ The application was brought to court so urgently that no written petitions had been prepared.⁷⁴⁴⁴

On September 6, 1960, the Supreme Court hearing resumed. Leslie Lawrence told the court that Pratt neither conceded nor opposed his daughter's application for an inquiry into his mental condition. Justice Theron announced that his judgement would be given the following day.⁷⁴⁴⁵ Mr. G. Colman Q.C., for Susan Pratt, told the court that “this is an application made by a daughter in good faith, actuated by the genuine desire to help her father, protect his property, and prevent a miscarriage of justice at the criminal trial... the application was made without the consent or knowledge of Mr. Pratt and it appeared last week against his will. I understand now that objection is not persisted in.” Pratt opposed the appointment of a provisional curator bonis, but agreed to the appointment of Mr. W.S. McEwan as curator ad litem with limited powers. He was entitled to interview Pratt and report to the court. Patricia supported his decision.⁷⁴⁴⁶ The following day, Justice Theron ⁷⁴⁴⁰ A curator ad litem is the person, usually an advocate, appointed by the court to investigate the mental condition of someone whose mental capability is in question (Maisels, 1998: 327).

⁷⁴⁴¹ The Cape Argus, 3 September 1960: 7, ‘Pratt says he can handle his own affairs’; The Times (London), 3 September 1960: 6, ‘Mental health of Pratt.’

⁷⁴⁴² Maisels, 1998: 102.

⁷⁴⁴³ The Times (London), 7 September 1960: 10, ‘Pratt consents to a ‘curator.’

⁷⁴⁴⁴ The Star, 3 September 1960: 1, ‘Pratt opposes court bid by daughter.’

⁷⁴⁴⁵ The Cape Argus, 6 September 1960: 1, ‘Pratt ‘neutral’ to daughter’s plea.’

⁷⁴⁴⁶ The Cape Argus, 6 September 1960: 1, ‘Pratt’s attitude to court application’; The Times (London), 7 September 1960: 10, ‘Pratt consents to a ‘curator.’

gave his judgement at the Pretoria Supreme Court and then ruled that it must remain secret until Pratt's trial on September 12.⁷⁴⁴⁷

DEFENCE WITNESSES

Thus finally, after a massive effort, mostly by his daughter Susan, Pratt was persuaded to plead being of unsound mind.⁷⁴⁴⁸ Pratt later wrote, "My daughter engaged very eminent Counsel for me who represented me at the preliminary hearing. When you engage Counsel you must take his advice, and the advice I received was to fight this on a mental basis and be committed to an institution."⁷⁴⁴⁹ Noel Spiller, Pratt's business partner who was a close friend of the Pratt family, was asked by the defence team to testify in support of the insanity plea, but she felt that she could not do so, as she did not consider Pratt to be insane. Shortly before the trial, at about nine o'clock at night, Susan Pratt telephoned her at home and begged her to testify to her father's supposed insanity, "Please, Auntie Noel, please," she said. "Daddy now at last has agreed to plead of unsound mind." Noel Spiller then agreed to testify.⁷⁴⁵⁰

Spiller was in a difficult position. If she averred that Pratt was insane, questions would be asked as to how she was a partner in business with a lunatic. On the other hand, if she said he wasn't crazy, Pratt might go to the gallows and that was the last thing she wanted. The rest of the defence witnesses were in identical situations. They included Elizabeth Radsma, Pratt's personal assistant for three and half years. She was asked by the defence to testify in support of the insanity plea. Like Spiller, she felt this would be a lie because she considered Pratt to be perfectly sane. In the event, she agreed to testify in a way she hoped would help him. She would not say that he was insane, but nor would she state the opposite. She would speak about Pratt's epilepsy and depression, while concealing his political activities and ideas. She described it as a balancing act, exaggerating Pratt's medical situation, but without suggesting that he was mad, which would have been a lie.⁷⁴⁵¹

⁷⁴⁴⁷ Judge Theron's judgement in Susan Pratt's ex parte application, 7 September 1960. Susan Diane Pratt 6000/60. NASA; Daily Express, 8 September 1960: 2, 'Pratt judgement stays secret'; The Cape Argus, 7 September 1960: 1, 'judge forbids publication of ruling on Pratt.'

⁷⁴⁴⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017; Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁴⁴⁹ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴⁵⁰ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁴⁵¹ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017; Sue Charter and Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

ANOTHER ESCAPE PLAN

On September 11, just one day before the trial, Pratt contrived to speak to Maisels alone at the prison. Handing the warder half a crown, Pratt asked him to procure a copy of the Sunday Times, and then indicated that Maisels' colleagues should wait outside the interview room. Speaking softly but urgently, he proposed that Maisels should create a diversion during his opening address at the trial, whereupon he Pratt would leap from the dock and escape through an open window. A car would be waiting outside to carry him to Lanseria airport, from where, he said, he had chartered a plane to Swaziland. Maisels declined to participate in the plan⁷⁴⁵² and Pratt abandoned it. However, hare-brained this scheme may sound, it showed that Pratt's friends still hoped to secure his freedom. It also suggests that at least two more people were involved, one with the car and one with the airplane.

⁷⁴⁵² Maisels, 1998: 104.

THE INQUIRY REGARDING PRATT'S MENTAL CONDITION

Justice Franz Rumpff was named to try the case, along with two assessors,⁷⁴⁵³ while R.W. Rein, was prosecuting for the Crown, assisted by Mr. K.D.M. Moodie, of the Attorney-General's office.⁷⁴⁵⁴ According to Nelson Mandela, Justice Rumpff (1912-1992), Judge President of the Transvaal Provincial Division since 1959,⁷⁴⁵⁵ was rumoured to be a member of the Broederbond⁷⁴⁵⁶ and was a known Nazi sympathiser, having defended pro-Nazis during the Second World War.⁷⁴⁵⁷ He had also acted as a judge at two major trials, the Treason Trial in 1956⁷⁴⁵⁸ and the Defiance Trial in 1952.⁷⁴⁵⁹ After the assassination of Dr. Verwoerd in 1966, Justice Rumpff was appointed chairman of a Commission to investigate the question of insanity and criminal responsibility. In 1974, he became Chief Justice of South Africa and kept this position until his retirement in 1982.⁷⁴⁶⁰

Just before the trial started, Maisels informed Rein that he intended to apply to the court to have Pratt declared mentally disordered since he was an epileptic and therefore, according to the Mental Disorder Act of 1916, unfit to stand trial.⁷⁴⁶¹ Rein agreed, then informed Maisels of a rumour that Pratt's wife, Patricia, had a relationship with Dr. Verwoerd. Rein asked Maisels not to raise the issue and he agreed, considering the rumour absurd.⁷⁴⁶² However, as we will see, Rein brought it up himself in an attempt to dismiss it.

⁷⁴⁵³ The New York Times, 13 September 1960: 10, 'African trial opens.'

⁷⁴⁵⁴ The Cape Argus, 8 September 1960: 1, 'Judge at Pratt trial not yet named.'

⁷⁴⁵⁵ Kahn, 1982: 438-440.

⁷⁴⁵⁶ Mandela, 2013: 29.

⁷⁴⁵⁷ Sachs, 1973: 257.

⁷⁴⁵⁸ Joseph, 1998; Davenport, 1991: 352.

⁷⁴⁵⁹ Buthelezi, 2006: 122.

⁷⁴⁶⁰ Kahn, 1982: 440.

⁷⁴⁶¹ Bird, 1992: 209; Maisels, 1998: 103.

⁷⁴⁶² Maisels, 1998: 103.

DAY 1: SEPTEMBER 12, 1960

The trial started on Monday, September 12, 1960 and Maisels promptly made an application that the court should inquire into Pratt's mental condition in terms of Section 28 of the Mental Disorders Act. He said that evidence he would produce would establish that Pratt fell within Clause 7, Section 3, of the Mentally Disordered Persons Act. This related to an epileptic who was a danger to himself or to others or was incapable of managing himself or his affairs. Maisels then produced medical evidence and a statement by Pratt that he did not intend to kill Dr. Verwoerd but only "to put him out of action for a few weeks." He also said that he had in his possession the report from W.S. McEwen, the curator ad litem appointed the previous week by Justice Theron, who was also present at the court that supported his application.⁷⁴⁶³

Prosecutor Rein, despite his agreement with Maisels, touched on the rumour of a Dr. Verwoerd relationship in his opening statement. In an attempt to clarify the issue, he said that, "neither the accused nor his wife, has ever met the Prime Minister, nor has either of them ever had any dealings with the Prime Minister of any nature whatsoever."⁷⁴⁶⁴

⁷⁴⁶³ Israel Maisels' opening address in Regina vs David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Daily Dispatch, 13 September 1960: 1, 'Special inquiry into mental state of Pratt'; The Cape Argus, 12 September 1960: 1, 'Inquiry ordered into Pratt's mental state.' The Times (London), 13 September 1960: 9, 'Pratt's mental state.'

⁷⁴⁶⁴ R.W. Rein's opening address in Regina vs David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

THE WITNESSESDR. JACK FRIEDMAN⁷⁴⁶⁵

The first defence witness was Dr. Jack Friedman, Senior District Surgeon and Professor of Forensic Medicine at the University of Witwatersrand, who examined Pratt on the night of the shooting. Dr. Friedman testified that he saw Pratt for the first time at 6.40 pm that day. There were physical injuries that were consistent with a beating, but what struck him, he said, was the air of detachment and unconcern that Pratt displayed. Pratt talked about his cattle, but did not appear to be particularly concerned with anything else. Pratt told him that his epilepsy was of no importance because he had been almost completely cured. He said he did not have an epileptic attack on the day of the assault and the last one was about two weeks earlier, when he fell off a horse.

Pratt spoke to Dr. Friedman about the government coalition he tried to form in 1954. He said that the day before the assault, he was passing a prison for women in Kotze Street when he saw female prisoners being taken away. He felt “that things had come to such a pass it was time something was done about it.” Dr. Friedman said this was “an incident that started a certain train” and that Pratt throughout their time together “was harping on political matters all the time.”

Pratt told him that on the day of the assault, he took his pistol with him, but he had not yet formed any definite plan to shoot Dr. Verwoerd. During the show, he was struck by the lack of concern from the public regarding political events; he said that if someone had only done something, even just shouted “boo,” he would have been satisfied. However, no-one did anything and he felt that he should. According to Dr. Friedman, Pratt said that he did not want to kill Dr. Verwoerd but to put him out of action for a few weeks, to give him time to think things over. Pratt told him, “I fired one shot.” When Dr. Friedman asked him how come there was a second bullet, Pratt said the gun fired accidentally when someone grabbed his arm.

Dr. Friedman said he found Pratt to be calm and coherent and remarkably unconcerned about what happened. “When a crime of that magnitude is committed, the arrested persons are always in a state of tension or nervousness. None of these symptoms were present. I regarded his air of detachment, of unconcern, as abnormal,” Dr. Friedman said. As to Pratt’s physical condition, he said it was obvious he had received “quite a beating up.” His blood pressure was 148 over 88, that is, within normal limits.

⁷⁴⁶⁵ Dr. Jack Friedman’s testimony at the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

The Prosecutor asked Dr. Friedman what conclusion he would have come to if Pratt had not mentioned that he suffered from epilepsy. “You would then have been left with just his injuries, the fact that he was normal in other respects and his unconcernedness.” In that case, the Prosecutor asked, would he still have summoned a psychiatrist to examine Pratt? Dr. Friedman replied yes, “His air of unconcernedness made it imperative for me, as part of my duty in the interest of justice, to have him examined psychiatrically. That is my practice and policy in any major crime.”

The Prosecutor then asked, “After you finished your examination, were you satisfied that he knew that when he shot the Prime Minister he had done something which in the eyes of the law was wrong.” Dr. Friedman replied, “I am not prepared to answer that.” It was purely a psychiatric matter, he said.

It should be mentioned here that Desmond Blow was of the opinion that Pratt wanted to kill Dr. Verwoerd and not “put him out of action for a few weeks.” Pratt never told him as much, it was just Blow’s belief formed from conversations he had with him and from a letter Pratt had written to him. The letter said, “The trouble was that I had tried to shoot the Prime Minister as the country as a whole certainly didn’t want him and there seemed no other way to get rid of him.”⁷⁴⁶⁶ Adding to Blow’s belief was a remark Pratt had made to him. Looking disappointed, Pratt said he felt his act had been for nothing and that he had failed, as Dr. Verwoerd was still alive and he himself was presented as a madman, destined to spend the rest of his life, or most of it, locked up in a hospital.⁷⁴⁶⁷

As to why Pratt claimed that he only wanted to injure Verwoerd, Blow speculated that he was urged to do so by his family and his lawyers to demonstrate that he had no murderous intent and would be judged more leniently. Blow told the author that Pratt told him also that the defence doctors had made up a lot of things, attributed to him things that were not true and exaggerated descriptions of events and situations. Although Pratt did not specify which items the doctors made up, Blow received the impression that one of them was the claim that ⁷⁴⁶⁶ David Pratt Letter to Desmond Blow, n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴⁶⁷ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

he only wanted to injure Verwoerd. He said Pratt had not protested for the sake of his daughter, Susan.⁷⁴⁶⁸

RICHARD KUMALO⁷⁴⁶⁹

The next witness was Richard Kumalo, a watchman at the Orient Manganese Company's mine on Pratt's farm at Magaliesburg. He testified that one day, not long before the assault on Dr. Verwoerd, he came across Pratt, who had been riding a horse, sprawled on the ground "like as if he was dead," with a white substance coming from his mouth. He saw injuries on the side of Pratt's face but also on his arm, as if Pratt had bitten himself. Kumalo said he called for help and an hour and a half later Pratt was back on his feet.

CORNELIUS ZIETSMAN⁷⁴⁷⁰

Zietsman had been employed by Pratt as a farm manager from 1942 to 1957. He said that Pratt had several epileptic seizures between 1942 and 1949, but they declined steadily after 1950. He described an epileptic attack in 1946 or 1947 when foam came from Pratt's mouth and his body became taut, and another seizure in 1957. He testified that Pratt was a very pleasant man when he was normal, but very unpleasant when he was abnormal, that is, when he had his epileptic seizures. Pratt once made verbal threats against someone but Zietsman never saw him attack anyone or show any violent tendencies.

NOEL D. SPILLER⁷⁴⁷¹

Noel Spiller was Pratt's business partner in the Crayfish Inn. Before the trial, she made it clear to Maisels and to Susan Pratt that she could not support their insanity plea, but she agreed to speak about Pratt's "eccentricity." As she approached the bench to testify, she ⁷⁴⁶⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁴⁶⁹ Richard Kumalo's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴⁷⁰ Cornelius Zietsman's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴⁷¹ Noel Spiller's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA unless referenced otherwise.

passed in front of Pratt in the dock. Pratt, recognising the difficulty of her situation, said quietly to her, “Just tell the truth, nothing but the truth.”⁷⁴⁷²

Spiller said she had known Pratt for many years and was aware of two epileptic seizures in 1948 and 1950. She said Pratt had stayed at their inn from March 16 to 19 that year with his daughter Susan, and had seemed very worried about the situation in South Africa, as well as about business. She described him at the time as very difficult, tense, troubled, uncertain and inconsistent in his views.

Although she said she did not think Pratt “was really politically minded,” she also said that he was worried that there was no progress in South Africa. “He said things were wonderful overseas and wonderful progress was being made, while there was no progress in South Africa.” She told the court that when business confidence in South Africa plummeted after Sharpeville, Pratt persuaded her to continue with their joint civic centre development in Ramsgate, saying, “One must never stop progress.”

On April 6, three days before the assault, she received a letter from him saying that he had enjoyed his previous stay at the hotel and was coming again later that month. Spiller characterised Pratt as an “extremely generous person” but also “an astute businessman who knew what he wanted and what he was after.”

Rein cross-examined Noel Spiller about Pratt’s visit to the Crayfish Inn with his daughter Susan, two and half weeks before the assault:

REIN: Did he talk coherently about his business?

SPILLER: Yes

REIN: Both of them?

SPILLER: Both of them.

REIN: So in regard to business you saw nothing abnormal?

SPILLER: No

REIN: Is he an astute businessman, in your opinion?

SPILLER: Yes.

⁷⁴⁷² Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

REIN: He knows what he wants and he knows what he is after, is that right?

SPILLER: That is right.

REIN: And during those three days, when it came to business, you saw nothing abnormal?

SPILLER: No, nothing. (Hesitatingly).

REIN: You can think again if you have got any doubt.

SPILLER: No, nothing abnormal.

REIN: And you told us that during those three days he was strained and worried in regard to situations in South Africa compared with overseas?

SPILLER: That is right.

REIN: What makes you say that? What did he say to you?

SPILLER: Well, we were contemplating building a chemist's shop, a doctor's consulting room and a hairdresser's salon in Ramsgate, next to the Bottle Store, and Mr. Pratt was going to lend the money for this venture, and it was I who was rather keen to withdraw because of the riots and the situation in the country.

REIN: Which riots?

SPILLER: Well, the riots that had been taking place... I was rather hesitant about it because I thought that things were not right in the country, and I was not keen to be responsible for any more business, and Mr. Pratt did say to me that in spite of everything we must never stop progress... he said it was wonderful overseas to see the prosperity, and to come back to this country and see things as they were compared with overseas, I think it might have been a shock for him.

REIN: Have you heard him ever make violent statements?

SPILLER: No.

REIN: Have you ever heard him pass any adverse criticism of the Government?

SPILLER: No, not at that time. I did not think he was very politically minded, actually.

Spiller was also asked by Maisels to describe some of Pratt's "strange" habits and moments. She then recounted an incident which she said had probably led to an epileptic seizure: One morning when the weather was "very bad, cold and windy," Pratt went swimming against Spiller's advice and nearly drowned.

COMMENTS ON SPILLER'S TESTIMONY

Spiller later admitted that she was in a difficult position because she could not support the defence's insanity plea, but wanted to testify and help Pratt in any possible way. What she did not say in the court, was what she believed, that Pratt was perfectly sane and the "worst" you could say about him was that he was eccentric.

She lied about never hearing Pratt making threats and not being politically minded. Naturally, she did not reveal the dompas incident. One day, she, Pratt and others were at their Inn discussing the Pass Law. Pratt said openly, "It's terrible the way they are all rounded up because they haven't a dompas." Spiller considered the discussion to be "as political as it can be." When someone in the group said, "Oh, somebody should shoot that man," referring to Dr. Verwoerd, Pratt said, "Somebody should. I think it should be me."⁷⁴⁷³

ELIZABETH RADSMA⁷⁴⁷⁴

Radsma was Pratt's private secretary and personal assistant for three and half years. She was in charge of his business while he was away and he trusted her implicitly. Radsma testified that Pratt once described to her a feeling of euphoria he had experienced. He told her he heard beautiful music, everything seemed to be easy and he felt as if he could move mountains. Radsma was asked about a letter which she said she found among his personal belongings after the shooting. The letter in Pratt's handwriting and addressed to "Dear Elizabeth," said Pratt could "see no light." It said, "Everyone will feel relief in the ease of tension." Pratt said he was sorry he "could not make the grade," adding, "I understand this condition is fairly common among epileptics who become progressively worse." Radsma said she considered the letter to be a suicide note, although Pratt did not commit suicide.

Radsma characterised Pratt as a very kind and calm man. She said he suffered from depression because of his marriage, but this improved dramatically after he began treatment with Dr. Jacobson in November 1958, "He took matters much easier." She also testified that ⁷⁴⁷³ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁴⁷⁴ Elizabeth Radsma's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Pratt had an epileptic fit and he had fallen off a horse two or three weeks before he committed the assault.

COMMENTS ON RADSMA'S TESTIMONY

In a personal interview, Radsma said Pratt "hated apartheid and really hated Dr. Verwoerd for what he was doing to the Black people. He really cared about them and the way they were treated." She said she did not mention this in her evidence "because it would have been bad for him with regard to his trial." She said, "I was told by the defence not to mention his political ideas, and how he felt about Dr. Verwoerd. I know that the other witnesses were also asked to not mention anything about his ideas and his feelings."⁷⁴⁷⁵

Radsma also said Pratt was a very sensitive man who cared particularly about the poor and disadvantaged. She believed his sensitivity about certain things led him to depression. He was shocked, extremely depressed and upset by the Sharpeville massacre. He felt ashamed that he was South African and that he lived in South Africa. Referring to the time he saw two vans with Black prisoners just a few days before the shooting, she said this sent him into depression again, but he also became very angry with apartheid.⁷⁴⁷⁶

Radsma said Pratt was particularly kind to the Black South Africans who lived and worked on his farm. She never saw any other White person treating Blacks in that generous way. She said Pratt was always politically aware, hated Dr. Verwoerd and apartheid, and was eager to find a way of changing this situation, but no-one expected that he would go out and shoot Dr. Verwoerd. She said when she first arrived in South Africa, Pratt drove her through Sophiatown and explained to her what had happened there and what apartheid was and this was quite a shock for her.⁷⁴⁷⁷

However, she said that in court she did not refer to Pratt's political ideas or his opinion of Dr. Verwoerd because she knew it would be damaging for him. As for the defence request that she should agree that Pratt was insane, she felt she could not do this because she believed he was not only perfectly sane, but extremely intelligent and able. She knew, however, that his future depended partly on her testimony, so she tried not to reveal anything damaging, not always to give the whole truth and, when it would be in his favour, to ⁷⁴⁷⁵ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴⁷⁶ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴⁷⁷ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

exaggerate certain things. What she also did not explain was that Pratt's euphoria was an effect of his medication and not the delusions of a schizophrenic person, although she did not claim that Pratt was schizophrenic either.⁷⁴⁷⁸

In addition, Radsma told the author:

“We were all in a difficult position. We knew that if David was found guilty, he would probably be imprisoned for many years or even hanged, so we wanted to save his life. But it was not so easy to just say that he was mad and make up stories to prove he was mad. But we could not have said the truth either as he would have been found guilty. None of us said anything about his political ideas and that he despised Dr. Verwoerd and apartheid. And fortunately, as far as I remember, none of us was asked anything like this... we all, [the defence witnesses] along with the lawyers, tried to find a way to formulate what we would say in the court so David would get away. It was a balancing act, we did not say that he was not mad, but we also did not say that he was mad. We just highlighted and exaggerated a little some situations about him. It was the only way to save his life.”⁷⁴⁷⁹

According to Radsma, many people who knew Pratt wanted to testify about his character, believing that they would be helping him. However, his lawyers did not want witnesses to Pratt's character, but witnesses who could support their defence line. Radsma is certain that Pratt told the truth when he said he did not have a plan to shoot Dr. Verwoerd that day. He took his pistol with him as he often did in case he was attacked, as he had been two to three weeks ago before the assault.⁷⁴⁸⁰

Radsma is also absolutely certain that Pratt was perfectly sane:

“He was not mad, not at all. He was perfectly all right. The only thing that you could say about his health was that he was an epileptic, that's all, nothing else. I think his depression was caused by his epilepsy but also from the fact that he was very sensitive. He became depressed very easily, easier than anyone I know. He was depressed because he was not able to see his children who he absolutely adored, but also because of apartheid and the situation in South Africa. Every time he read something in the newspaper that was caused by apartheid, he became depressed. Particularly after Sharpeville, he was like I had never seen him before. I was very worried about him because he had taken it too hard. He somehow felt ⁷⁴⁷⁸ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴⁷⁹ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴⁸⁰ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

guilty and ashamed because he was a white South African and he had all these comforts while people were suffering and dying.”⁷⁴⁸¹

ROBERT RODERICK CHARTER⁷⁴⁸²

Robert Charter, manager of B. Owen Jones Ltd, knew Pratt “very well” and for thirteen years was his business partner in the trout hatchery at Maloney’s Eye and lived on Pratt’s farm. Charter was aware that Pratt was an epileptic, but he had never seen him having a fit, although he had seen him just after and just before one. In early 1958, Charter went to Holland at Pratt’s request, to try to persuade Pratt’s wife, Patricia, to return with their children to South Africa. However, Charter failed to convince her and Pratt became very unhappy and depressed.

Charter read a letter to the court addressed to him by Pratt:

“Dear Bob, sorry about this, but I honestly think it is the best for everyone. Pat’s fears will now be removed and she will be able to return to South Africa with the kids and build up a home at Old Sillery. Please watch my children and see that they don’t become too foreign. It is impracticable for me to run away and lead another life because I depend so much on drugs and I don’t think Pat would ever feel secure. It is obvious that I am deteriorating, so it is better for all that I go before I become a nuisance.”

Charter said the letter worried him and he went immediately to Pratt’s house. Pratt was not there but he found another letter to him from Pratt. It said among other things:

“I have always been a bit of a fatalist and this time Nico (Charter’s wife) took a hand and turned up, complete with family just a few minutes too soon to make the two letters effective. As a result I have now swung right away from depression and hope to make a new life for myself... If you don’t hear from me for over a year, you can presume death and wind up my affairs accordingly. I am sure I am doing the right thing as the present position is quite untenable.”

Charter discovered that Pratt had gone to Natal, but he gave no further explanation about the letters or what happened to Pratt after that time. Charter did reveal that in 1954 he ⁷⁴⁸¹ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁴⁸² Robert Charter’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

arranged for Pratt to meet a well-known politician, whom he did not name in his testimony, to discuss the possibility of forming a coalition government. However, nothing came of it.

In 1958, Pratt told Charter that he decided that the only way in which he could get peace of mind was to give away everything he possessed. At the same time, Pratt was continually propounding different political theories which he thought could help the people and the world, though Charter found them unrealistic. However, he agreed that Pratt was able to “converse fluently and lucidly about those theories.”

Cross-examined by Rein about Pratt’s political theories, the following exchanges took place:

REIN: There was nothing in his speech or his thoughts which indicated that he was mentally diseased then in your view?

CHARTER: No, in fact it was in many instances quite an intellectual experience. We would enjoy these discussions immensely, even if you did not agree with him at least you could follow his arguments, and he used to expound very clearly.

The Prosecutor then asked Charter about Pratt’s political theories: “Was there nothing in his speech and thought which would give the impression he was mentally diseased?” Charter avoided a direct answer, saying, “It was quite an intellectual experience. We used to enjoy his theories immensely.” Charter concluded by saying that Pratt could not manage his affairs and there had been a change in his attitude and mental state over the years. He added that Pratt was interested in the Liberal Party approach and that he had books about Yoga.

Charter testified that if Pratt stopped changing his mind, he would be a very smart businessman indeed, but he changed his mind too often. He gave examples of how Pratt would change his mind. One Saturday morning, Pratt said he was going to Tara Hospital because he was going insane and needed treatment. However, he did not go to the hospital, he went to his flat instead. Many times, he would make an appointment but then not turn up.

Charter also told the court that Pratt used to get up late at night and start playing the piano. He would start playing a piece by Chopin, but then would play the same bars over and over. Charter said he found this strange. At one point, Charter said Pratt was a member of the United Party when they first met. At this stage Pratt got up and addressed the bench:

PRATT: My lord, may I say first of all categorically that Mr. Charter is making an error, and secondly that I have been listening to a lot of evidence that I think would be much more clarified and much more rapid for the Court if I was allowed to make a personal statement.

JUDGE: I think you should first consult with your legal adviser after the adjournment.

PRATT: Righto, my lord, I will accept what you say on this. I think perhaps it was wrong of me to stand up just when I did. It is a little late in the afternoon. My learned friend can carry on. I will consult with you when we adjourn.

COMMENTS ON CHARTER'S TESTIMONY

Like the other defence witnesses, Charter was uncertain how to handle his court testimony. As with Radsma and Spiller, he could not claim that his business partner was mentally disordered because he did not believe that he was, but he feared that if Pratt was not found insane, he might be hanged or imprisoned for many years. Therefore, he tried to portray Pratt as a strange man by describing and exaggerating some incidents while failing to mention Pratt's strong anti-apartheid beliefs.

FATHER REGINALD JOSEPH ORSMOND⁷⁴⁸³

Father Reginald Orsmond, a Roman Catholic priest, founder and director of Boys' Town, a mission at Magaliesburg, was the last witness on the first day. He testified that he met Pratt when he arrived in Magaliesburg in 1956 and got to know him very well. He believed that Pratt was very much in love with his wife and there was nothing he wanted more than that she should return from Europe, but she refused. After that, it seemed to him that Pratt "had reached a stage at which he felt he had lost all dignity. He considered himself a wash-out, to put it plainly."

Pratt stayed at the Boys' Town guest-house for two or three days some two weeks before the shooting. The priest believed that Pratt came to him for two reasons, "because he was violently upset, he was as far as I could see mentally ill, and he was attempting to find help to alleviate this illness of his. The second reason was that I do believe there was a genuine desire to embrace a religion.” At one point Pratt hinted that “the only way out” of his troubles was to take his own life, but Father Orsmond “put him off this.” He said Pratt was “extremely depressed” and changed his mind quite often on certain points.

⁷⁴⁸³ Father Reginald Orsmond's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Father Orsmond also confirmed that Pratt had attempted to form a Coalition Government and stated that there was a rumour that Pratt was a member of the Nationalist Party. The following exchanges took place during cross-examination:

REIN: Did you think he was insane?

FR. ORSMOND: I don’t even think a psychiatrist could give a definite answer to that question. I could not.

REIN: Did you think there was something wrong with him mentally?

FR. ORSMOND: Well, should I put it to you this way: I did think that he was emotionally upset at least.

REIN: Did you think he did not know what he was doing?

FR. ORSMOND: I think he knew what he was doing.

REIN: And did you have many and long talks with him?

FR. ORSMOND: Yes, many talks, some of them long.

REIN: And as a result of those talks you never thought that this man ought to have somebody to look after him, or look after his affairs? Or did you, Father?

FR. ORSMOND: I did think that he needed help badly, but to say that a man cannot look after his own affairs, I don’t think I am one to judge that. He definitely did not strike me as being habitually insane.

REIN: Did you think that he was insane at times?

FR. ORSMOND: I cannot even say that, no.

REIN: All you can say is that he was a very worried and depressed man?

FR. ORSMOND: Correct.

COMMENTS ON FATHER ORSMOND'S TESTIMONY

Father Orsmond said years later to filmmaker Guy Spiller that Pratt was odd, but not mentally disordered. He said,

“I found him a very concerned person, concerned for things of justice, and he had a great mercy for people suffering illness or poverty. I do know that he wasn't an evil man. I do know that he would not have committed a cold-blooded murder just for the sake of cold-blooded murder. I doubt even if he would defend himself if he was personally being attacked by trying to kill the oppressor, the attacker. But in this case there was more than just the life of one man; in this case there were really the lives of thousands and thousands of people, and the future of the country. In some ways he could have seen that, in his conscience, as a noble thing. And if he saw it as a noble thing, he could not be condemned as having a bad conscience, no.”⁷⁴⁸⁴

Father Orsmond recalled in The Liberal and the Pirate his own appearance in court:

“At the trial, I was asked by the advocate – who was leading me, of course – did I think that David was completely sane, or was there any chance that he was unbalanced? And I said, “Well, as far as I am concerned, on the whole, if you look at him and you think of him and you are just talking to him, I don't think he... well, you couldn't call him insane.” You couldn't call him, say, schizophrenic or anything like that, but he was odd. I think that's the best word – he was odd.”

Asked by Guy Spiller to describe an “odd encounter” with Pratt, Father Orsmond said: “Well, on one occasion he invited me to dinner at his house. And when I knocked on the door, he opened the door and he said, ‘Good evening. Can I help you?’ and then I said ‘Yes, David, I'm here for dinner.’ And, of course, he had forgotten about it. Odd in that way, but certainly not insane.”⁷⁴⁸⁵

⁷⁴⁸⁴ Father Orsmond in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁴⁸⁵ Father Orsmond in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

DAY 2: 13 SEPTEMBER 1960

THE WITNESSES

CHARLES FRIEDMAN⁷⁴⁸⁶

Charles Friedman was an attorney with the Johannesburg firm of solicitors, Hayman, Godfrey and Sanderson, who had acted for Pratt for many years. Friedman described Pratt as “a very intelligent person but a difficult client, moody and at times unpredictable. It needed a great deal of patience and firmness to handle his affairs.” He would change his mind frequently, but “quite clearly” he was able to understand what he was doing. Friedman said Pratt went abroad last May, deeply concerned about his wife but mostly about his children who were overseas; he was anxious to obtain custody of them.

Friedman saw Pratt in November last year in London and found a “remarkable change” in him. “He was easy to get on with,” he said. Friedman knew he had been having treatment. He next saw Pratt on his return to South Africa in February, also in March before he went to Durban. He saw him almost daily in the last week of March and he last saw him on April 1, just eight days before the shooting. Said Friedman:

“He was more difficult than I had ever known him before. He was almost impossible, and there was quite a transformation again from the man that I had seen in London and prior to his departure for Durban. He was extremely tense, moody, and you just could not get at him. He just would not listen to you, or to me I should say, and he was absolutely unpredictable. I had to exercise the greatest patience that I ever have had to exercise and firmness, with him, during that period of one week.”

Friedman testified that Pratt was a “very intelligent man” and had a “sound business sense, but then he would not stick to it, he would vary from it.” In the end his decisions usually proved sound-although Friedman claimed that a lot of them were influenced by him.

⁷⁴⁸⁶ Charles Friedman’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

DR. BENJAMIN CHESLER⁷⁴⁸⁷

Dr. Chesler was a specialist psychiatrist who began treating Pratt on July 4, 1954 at the request of Mrs. Pratt. Pratt was at the Sanatoria Nursing Home because he was “unmanageable at home.” Chesler testified that he found Pratt in “a post-epileptic state of clouded consciousness.” He was suffering from acute mental confusion that apparently followed upon a series of epileptic seizures. During this time Pratt was given electroconvulsive therapy (E.C.T.) and was discharged on July 13, 1954. A subsequent electroencephalograph showed abnormal activity consistent with grand mal epilepsy.

Dr. Chesler explained to the court the characteristics of grand mal epilepsy:

“There is an aura, a sensation, which may take the form of sensory or motor sensation - he may feel something in his body lasting about 30 seconds - there is a warning sign. Sometimes they don’t have this aura at all. Some patients most frequently utter a cry and then there is a sudden immediate loss of consciousness. The patient falls down and for about half a minute to a minute he is in a tonic phase, that is extreme rigidity of the body, followed after this by jerky convulsive movements also lasting about 30 seconds to a minute, and then there is a varying period of confusion or unconsciousness after the seizure. Most of them regain their consciousness after a short while, a minute or two, and then go into a sleep for varying periods. They may sleep for half an hour to an hour, but that is the pattern, with variations.”

Dr. Chesler identified a certificate he signed regarding Pratt under the Mental Disorders Act. An extract from the certificate read, “He is extremely confused and has acted in a dangerously aggressive manner.” Dr. Chesler also testified that Pratt told him that “he felt he would like to give away his money to some charitable organisation, that he felt he would be happier.” Dr. Chesler did not elaborate on the subject.

Pratt did not visit Dr. Chesler often and for many months the doctor did not see him. When he did, he found Pratt to be “abnormally impulsive. His behaviour was unpredictable, and he was at times subject to sudden fluctuations in mood.” Asked by Maisels to give examples of this impulsive and unpredictable behaviour, Dr. Chesler remembered two incidents: “Mr. Pratt would have an appointment, and he may fail to keep it, and a month or two later he would come along and say he had gone off to London. On one occasion he had a rash, we thought it was due to the treatment, we were not certain, it was not responding to treatment from a dermatologist. Without telling me, Mr. Pratt went on a boat trip to Buenos Aires.”

⁷⁴⁸⁷ Dr. Chesler’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Dr. Chesler said Pratt’s epileptic attacks occurred about once every six weeks. There was a sudden immediate loss of consciousness, there was extreme rigidity and the body was convulsed by jerky movements. On January 17, 1956, Pratt was diagnosed by Dr. Chesler as suffering from severe melancholia. “Pratt became violent and smashed windows and had to be removed and locked up in Sanatoria. There he descended into what he described as “a Miltonian hell, complete with fires, prongs and yells of anguish.”

In addition to shock treatment and because he suffered from depression, Pratt also received psychotherapy. After the psychotherapy, he seemed “capable of leading a normal social life.” Dr. Chesler said Pratt seemed to be capable of managing his own affairs, which was a remarkable improvement. He warned him though not to take alcohol and to be sure to continue with his medication.

In August 1958, Dr. Chesler said, Pratt complained of being overcome by a feeling of despondency and depression, and from a physical examination that was true. There appeared to have been an organic deterioration which impaired his mental faculties to such a degree that he was not capable of managing his affairs. Dr. Chesler diagnosed a “progressive organic deterioration” which he thought had impaired Pratt’s mental faculties to such a degree that “he was incapable of satisfactorily managing his affairs.” He thought there was “an irreversible organic change that had taken place in the brain” and “came to the opinion that there was a general impairment of his intellectual faculties” and felt that his powers of judgment and reasoning were noticeably impaired and that “the emotional liability that he had shown previously had increased, that he was more impulsive, more prone to sudden, unpredictable mood swings, and had become morbidly suspicious.” In addition Pratt was “showing aggressive behaviour.” He assaulted a relative and said he was thinking of going to Holland to abduct his children.

Dr. Chesler said he warned Pratt’s sister, Mrs. Ricketts, of the deterioration in his mental state and advised her to apply for the appointment of a curator bonis. She did not take his advice, he said, and he advised Pratt to find another psychiatrist. Pratt then went to Dr. Jacobson.

Under cross-examination by Rein, Dr. Chesler conceded that his diagnosis of irreversible organic deterioration “could have been wrong”:

DR. CHESLER: I was not certain that I was correct. Psychiatry is not a factual science, a lot of it is subjective interpretation. I had known Mr. Pratt for four years. I had got to know him very well. I had seen these subtle changes take place. I was perturbed. Clinically, I felt that the man had deteriorated, there was organic deterioration, but another clinician might not have agreed with me.

REIN: It was just your opinion, doctor, and like most opinions could have been wrong?

DR. CHESLER: That is so.

Dr. Chesler then agreed that “the majority of epileptics never display mental symptoms” and that “those who do show some, the majority of them carry on with their normal occupations throughout their life.” Finally, asked by Maisels whether Pratt fell under the meaning of the Mental Disorders Act, Dr. Chesler replied that he was unable to express an opinion since he was not aware of Pratt’s present condition, not having examined him since 1958.

COMMENTS ON DR. CHESLER’S TESTIMONY

The reasons for which Dr. Chesler asked Pratt’s sister to appoint a curator bonis for her brother need further elaboration. Dr. Chesler suggested a curator bonis appointment not on grounds that Pratt was mentally ill, but because he was becoming irresponsible with his business. However, Pratt’s sister disagreed with Dr. Chesler’s opinion and did nothing about it.

Pratt’s sister was not the only one close to him who disagreed with Dr. Chesler’s opinion and ignored it. Elizabeth Radsma, Pratt’s personal assistant at the time, characterised the doctor’s diagnosis as “wrong” and told the author that her employer was “perfectly capable” of handling his own affairs and that he was a “shrewd businessman.”⁷⁴⁸⁸ Radsma and Pratt’s sister are not the only ones who disagreed with Dr. Chesler. Noel Spiller, who knew Pratt for twelve years and was a close friend as well as a business partner, also rejected the idea that he was unable to look after his affairs. She described him in her trial testimony as an “astute businessman who knew what he wanted and what he was after.”⁷⁴⁸⁹ It seems most unlikely that Pratt would have been unable to look after their business and his business partner would have done nothing. Being his business partner and friend for so many years suggests that her opinion carries some weight. The opinions of these two women, who worked closely with Pratt at different levels of his life for many years, warrant serious consideration.

⁷⁴⁸⁸ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview with the author, 9 January 2017.

It seems that Pratt’s employees at his sweet factory also disagreed with Dr. Chesler’s opinion, given that they wanted him to fire van Niekerk, a manager, and run the business himself.⁷⁴⁹⁰ Desmond Blow told the author that Pratt was entirely capable of running a business from his room at the hospital. Deeply impressed by the intelligent way Pratt prepared for the reopening of his trial, Blow had no doubt that his friend was “more than capable” of managing his own affairs. “If he could do it so easily from the hospital, I am sure he could have done it when he was outside,” Blow said.⁷⁴⁹¹

After the inquiry into his mental state and during his confinement in hospital, Pratt made plans for a retrial. Believing that the authorities would not want to re-open his case, he sought to conceal his intentions. Firstly, he would sprinkle sugar in the corridor which led to his room, so that he could hear warders approaching and have time to hide his documents; secondly, he used code names for the prominent anti-apartheid people he wanted to testify on his behalf. Harry Oppenheimer was “Uncle Henry” and Sir Paul Dukes was “Peter the gardener.” As we will see, Pratt had prepared a detailed plan of how to proceed with the re-opening of his case. The preparation of his case and its concealment from the authorities were clearly the works of a man who was more than capable of managing his own affairs.

We should remember that Pratt was a person of extreme sensitivity deeply concerned for his fellow citizens who at this time was undergoing a series of emotional and intellectual pressures. These included his marriage, his separation from his adored children, his epilepsy, his depression and his concerns about the national political situation. Pratt could become depressed very easily, perhaps by seeing someone mistreated or a person begging for food, common features of South Africa at the time.

Given Pratt’s many emotional, business and political pressures, it is understandable ⁷⁴⁸⁹ Noel Spiller’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 12 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴⁹⁰ David Pratt’s ‘Method for approaching trial.’ n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴⁹¹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

that Pratt would fantasise about getting away from it all and going to live in a little cottage in England far from his troubles. It is the gesture of a person under enormous pressure, not of someone mentally ill. The issue of Pratt wanting to give away his possessions will be discussed in detail in Prof. Hurst's testimony. As we will see, many people have given away their possessions for the same reasons as set out by Pratt, and none of them has been diagnosed as insane.

Dr. Chesler's reference to Pratt's "aggressiveness" was an exaggeration. What transpired between Pratt and the relative was no more than an argument. Pratt said about the incident, "Another occasion concerned the management of my sweet factors by my cousin Stuart Pratt. I was very dissatisfied with the policy he was pursuing and in addition had reason to suspect his honesty. After some difficult sessions at the factory I arranged a meeting at my office in Surrey House where we would be quite private and staff could not overhear. He didn't turn up so I drove to the factory and found him reading a newspaper. I then pulled him out of his chair and had a fight."⁷⁴⁹² Pratt's anger in such a situation seems perfectly reasonable. His cousin was not running the business the way Pratt wanted and then failed to keep an appointment with his boss, preferring to read up on the news.

As for Pratt's plan to abduct his children, that was certainly an irresponsible idea, but more a demonstration of the love and desperation of an adoring father than a sign of insanity. Fathers and mothers around the world abduct their children without the consent of the other parent because they are in similar situations to Pratt's. According to the Guardian newspaper, in the United Kingdom in the year 2012 alone, more than 500 children were abducted by one of their parents. None of the abductors was reported to be mentally ill, but some faced problems similar to Pratt's.⁷⁴⁹³ The author does not approve of child abduction or of Pratt's plan, but it must be emphasized that such situations are not a sign of mental illness. Finally, it must not be overlooked, Pratt never did abduct his children.

⁷⁴⁹² David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁴⁹³ Hattenstone (The Guardian), 21 September 2013, 'My partner abducted my child: the parents left behind.' Retrieved from: <https://www.theguardian.com/lifeandstyle/2013/sep/21/partner-abducted-child-parents-left-behind>

PROFESSOR LEWIS A. HURST⁷⁴⁹⁴INTRODUCTION

Prof. Hurst, Professor of Psychological Medicine at the University of the Witwatersrand and Chief Psychiatrist at the Johannesburg and Tara Hospitals. In 1959 he became the first full-time professor of psychiatry at University of the Witwatersrand, indeed the first in South Africa.⁷⁴⁹⁵ As stated earlier, he was a regular guest at Pratt's Crayfish Inn and a good friend of Pratt's business partner there, Noel Spiller,⁷⁴⁹⁶ although the author cannot say if he personally knew Pratt. Surprisingly maybe, none of these links became known during the inquiry. In 1964, Prof. Hurst would be chosen by the defence to examine John Harris, the man who planted a bomb in a Johannesburg train station. He found Harris unfit to stand trial, as he found Pratt. However, the Court would dismiss his opinion and instead accept the diagnosis of Professor van Wyk, the State psychiatrist who would later examine Tsafendas on behalf of the State. Van Wyk diagnosed Harris as perfectly sane and fit to stand trial.⁷⁴⁹⁷

PROF. HURST'S TESTIMONY

Prof. Hurst testified that on April 9, 1960, at around 8 p.m., he was called by Dr. Friedman to examine Pratt. The examination lasted two hours and Dr. Friedman, another doctor and Detective Head Constable P.J. Koekemoer were also present. The author has not been able to identify the unnamed doctor. Neither Friedman nor Hurst mentions his name. Almost certainly, it was not Dr. Jacobson, who was treating Pratt at that time. Jacobson, who testified at the trial, said nothing about being at that examination and his name does not appear in any official document. If he had been present, Attorney-General Rein would almost surely have brought it up in his cross-examination.

According to Prof. Hurst, Pratt conversed with him in a "calm, coherent, lucid manner." On April 12, Hurst completed a psychiatric report on Pratt, which he gave to Dr. Friedman to submit to the police. During the examination, Prof. Hurst said, Pratt told him that his seizures had started at the age of eight and that there were two types. The more severe ⁷⁴⁹⁴ Unless referenced otherwise, all the parts in Prof. Hurst's testimony are taken from his testimony in the Enquiry Regarding the Mental Condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁴⁹⁵ Minde, 1977: 211.

⁷⁴⁹⁶ Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

⁷⁴⁹⁷ State v. Harris (Appellate Division), 11 February-1 March 1965: 340-341.

type was one in which he lost consciousness, fell to the ground and on occasion bit his tongue. The second was a milder fit, which, on the basis of medical evidence, he called le petit mal. Dr. Lennox of Boston gave it this name after examining Pratt in 1946 when Pratt visited America to seek a cure for his epilepsy.

Prof. Hurst testified that Pratt's memory on the night of the shooting was in general intact, apart from amnesia relating to epileptic seizures, and that he gave an account of shooting Dr. Verwoerd. Pratt said that on the previous day, he saw about a hundred prisoners being bundled into a van and he asked himself: "What the hell will be happening next? This cannot go on. Where can we see any light?" The next morning, he had a very strong feeling that someone had to do something, adding, "and it better bloody well be me, feeling as I do about it." Asked about his reaction to the Prime Minister's speech at the fairground, Pratt told Prof. Hurst that he was "not impressed" and felt increasingly that he must do something. He thought, "What is the country going to do? What is all this leading to?" Then he thought, "I shall not kill the man, but lay him out for a month or so to give him time to think things over."

Asked about Pratt's state of mind and mood on April 9, Prof. Hurst said Pratt told him he was not as sociable as usual and this was due to the knowledge that he had a gun and whether or not he was going to use it. He also had a conviction that somebody had to sacrifice himself. Prof. Hurst also stated that the anti-epileptic medication that Pratt was taking "might have been responsible for some aspects of his mental state."

Prof. Hurst said Pratt spoke angrily against nationalism and said that at one point he had thought of giving away all of his possessions. Pratt talked of his attempt to form a coalition government and how he approached two political leaders. One, Nicolaas Havenga, agreed with him but the second turned him down and he then decided not to approach a third politician he had in mind. Prof. Hurst said Pratt seemed not to be concerned with achieving the rank of a minister with his coalition idea.

The professor concluded that Pratt failed to appreciate that he did not have the qualifications or experience to make a success of his grandiose and megalomaniac ideas. Prof. Hurst said, "His current lack of judgement and insight into his limitations of that time, as well as his currently assumed role of political saviour and martyr, lead me to the conclusion that he is at present suffering from a grandiose delusional trend of all megalomania." At this point of Prof. Hurst's testimony, while he was reading from his report,

Pratt rose from his seat and intervened: "Pardon me interrupting at this stage. I had asked that the medical evidence be given in camera. As it is impossible for that, is it essential that this section of Dr. Hurst's report be read out?" Judge Rumpff replied that it was essential, whereupon Pratt said, "I accept it," and resumed his seat.

Prof. Hurst also said that Pratt told him that in 1954 he heard organ music in his head which continued for several days. He was told this was purely psychological, but such experiences continued, reaching a stage in which he felt disembodied and as if he was looking down on his own body. Pratt described it to Hurst as an "almost Christ-like feeling." Later, Pratt was taken to Tara, but after he became violent and broke some windows, he was transferred to the Sanatoria Nursing Home.

Prof. Hurst then told the court, "there he descended into what he described as 'a Miltonian hell complete with fires, prongs and yells of anguish.' He quoted Pratt as saying, "Then I came up from that" to a state in which the whole world was a play and everybody was acting. This lasted a few days and one electro-convulsive treatment cured it. Then he enunciates a bizarre idea, that as a result of these experiences, he arrived at the conclusion that "epilepsy is a way of life and until I found it, I was depressed."

(At this stage Pratt intervened again) PRATT: May I object again, my lord? That is somewhat erroneous. I don't know whether there was a misunderstanding on Dr. Hurst's part, but it was in 1959, when taking treatment in London, when I formed that conclusion that epilepsy is a way of life.

JUDGE RUMPF: Yes, I will note that.

Regarding the shooting of Dr. Verwoerd, Prof. Hurst said, "He clearly recognised that his action was wrong in the eyes of the law, but felt in terms of his beliefs that for the good of the country that this consideration could be, and was, set aside. So he justifies it in terms of his political saviour/ martyr/ grandiose delusion, in my view. His regret, however, is for himself and his business associates. He said to me, 'My life is cleaved across. What the future holds for my associates and business concerns is what troubles me.'"

Prof. Hurst concluded that in his opinion, "there can be no doubt that Pratt is an epileptic. Moreover, his intention to maim the Prime Minister was formed in association with a mental disorder of a megalomaniac/delusional type." Incidentals such as Pratt playing the piano late at night and his suicide letters and other actions confirmed his findings as to Pratt's mental state, the professor said. He stated that he had no doubt that Pratt's case fell within the meaning of the Mental Disorders Act and the he should be classed as an epileptic under the Act.

Asked by the Prosecutor whether Pratt could have been dazed, could have had concussion or shock at the time of the shooting, Prof. Hurst replied that he had found no evidence of this. He said that from his conversation with Pratt, he realised he was dealing with a political crime, but he did not ask Pratt to which party he belonged because it was obvious that he was in opposition to the Government.

Prof. Hurst recommended that Pratt should be either be made “a Governor-General’s decision patient” or “be committed for observation to a mental disorder hospital, where he might be observed as to behaviour and the occurrence of fits and an electroencephalogram might be performed.”

COMMENTS ON PROF. HURST’S TESTIMONY

Professor Hurst’s testimony was important because he was a psychiatrist. He claimed that his diagnosis was based exclusively on a two-hour examination of Pratt which had taken place only five hours after the shooting. He had no access to any information about Pratt, apart from what he was told by Pratt himself. The issue of the two-hour examination was raised by the public prosecutor.

REIN: Would it not be safer if he were examined and observed for a longer period than the two hours you gave him on the day of the shooting?

PROF. HURST: I did consider that seriously in the recommendation in my report. Although the case seemed so clear, it seemed to me at that stage that a more prolonged period of observation might be necessary. However, from the additional information received from the witnesses, and also the presentation of this E.E.G., with this additional information, I can see no good purpose in further observation.⁷⁴⁹⁸

Thus, for Prof. Hurst, his two-hour examination and what he heard in the court from the witnesses, plus the results of an E.E.G. were enough to make a safe diagnosis about Pratt. However, when he wrote his report on Pratt, which was submitted to the police on April 12, three days after the examination, he had not yet heard any of the witnesses testify in court, ⁷⁴⁹⁸ Prof. Hurst’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

nor had he seen the E.E.G. In fact, he did not have any additional information about Pratt, so his diagnosis was based exclusively on what he was told by him. However, he did mention in his report at the time that further observation was necessary.

Dr. Chesler, who treated Pratt for four years and also saw the E.E.G. and heard the same witnesses, refused to give an opinion about Pratt's current condition because he had not spoken to him for two years. It seems highly unlikely if not impossible that any court today would accept a psychiatrist's diagnosis based entirely on a two-hour examination which took place only hours after the accused shot his victim and without any third-party information.

One of the world's leading forensic psychologists, Professor Kirk Heilbrun, agreed in an interview with the author that such a diagnosis would not have been seen as credible in an American court:

"It [Dr. Cooper's diagnosis] would not be given much credibility in a U.S. court. Many of the points we have discussed [above] would be incorporated into cross-examination to challenge the credibility of the opinions based only on self-report."⁷⁴⁹⁹

MEGALOMANIAC? SAVIOUR/MARTYR?

Prof. Hurst concluded that Pratt's "assumed role of political saviour and martyr" and his attempt to form a coalition to defeat the National Party "were grandiose or megalomaniac owing to his lack of appreciation" of what such an effort involved. This does not stand up to scrutiny. In the 1948 general election, the National Party defeated the United Party by forming a coalition with the Afrikaner Party. The leader of the Afrikaner Party was Nicolaas Havenga, the man David Pratt wanted to approach in order to form his proposed coalition.⁷⁵⁰⁰ The 1948 coalition and the involvement of Havenga suggest that Pratt's idea was perfectly realistic.

Furthermore, the choice of Havenga, who had been the Minister of Finance and Deputy Prime Minister in the Malan Government, seemed to be well-judged. Firstly, Havenga had participated in the 1948 Coalition and therefore had experience of such arrangements. Then, there was another factor which made him a prime candidate for the role Pratt had in mind. In 1951, the Afrikaner Party merged with the National Party, and in ⁷⁴⁹⁹ Professor Kirk Heilbrun in a personal interview, 15 January 2016.

⁷⁵⁰⁰ Dubow, 2014: 2, 35; Vatcher, 1965: 75, 138.

1954,⁷⁵⁰¹ Malan retired as Prime Minister and leader of the National Party. To succeed him as party leader, he chose Havenga. However, the Transvaal nominated its provisional leader, J.G. Strijdom, who subsequently outwitted Havenga and was eventually elected as NP leader. Pratt could have been aware of Havenga's feelings towards Strijdom, who became Prime Minister, although Havenga refrained from airing his bitterness publicly.⁷⁵⁰² These past political developments all made Havenga a logical and sensible choice for Pratt's proposal.

Oppenheimer was an excellent and logical choice by Pratt since he, too, wanted an end to apartheid. In April 1960, shortly after the Sharpeville Massacre, he declared publicly that "something will have to be done - and quickly. The longer we wait, the more difficult it will be." Oppenheimer suggested a series of gradual steps toward African majority rule, with built-in safeguards for the Whites, over the next twenty-five years. Verwoerd, of course, rejected the scheme.⁷⁵⁰³ As for Anton Rupert, he, too, was a logical choice; he was one of the richest and most influential men in South Africa, while it was known that he had a "very stormy relationship" with Dr. Verwoerd and objected to some of his policies.⁷⁵⁰⁴ Rupert allegedly said after the assassination that "the fact that Dr. Verwoerd was no longer Prime Minister, was the best thing that could have happened for South Africa."⁷⁵⁰⁵

Thus, it is clear from Pratt's trio of choices that his proposal for a coalition was both serious and realistic. Were it not for Rupert's negative response, the coalition could have become a reality. Prof. Hurst made clear that Pratt did not seek a Cabinet post or any other position by forming this coalition, evidence surely that his motive was simply a desire to defeat the National Party and end apartheid and not to achieve personal power or recognition.

However, perhaps the best proof that Prof. Hurst was wrong about Pratt is provided by the story of a man who became known colloquially as "Monsieur Jacques."⁷⁵⁰⁶ French millionaire businessman Jean-Yves Ollivier (Monsieur Jacques) visited South Africa for the first time in 1981 and swiftly concluded that the country was in dire trouble. He said that "arriving in South Africa in 1981 felt like visiting another planet. I wondered how the whites ⁷⁵⁰¹ Giliomee 2011: 492.

⁷⁵⁰² Vatcher, 1965: 115, 125.

⁷⁵⁰³ Newsweek, 11 April 1960: 55, 'Exploding South Africa.'

⁷⁵⁰⁴ Parker (Sunday Tribune), 28 August 1966: 1, "Verwoerd must go' plan: Cape Nats back Anton Rupert.;" Wood et al, 2014: 1363.

⁷⁵⁰⁵ Marais, 1994: 11.

⁷⁵⁰⁶ For a detailed account of Monsieur Jacques' activities see the 2013 documentary by Carlos Agullo and Mandy Jacobson Plot for Peace.

did not realize that, unless they changed and accepted to share the country, they were headed for disaster.⁷⁵⁰⁷

Ollivier decided to work alone for an end to apartheid and, using his wealth, status and connections, he acted as mediator and contact man for the ANC and the apartheid government to resolve many dangerous and long-standing issues. Notably, he played a significant role in securing the release of Nelson Mandela and smoothing the path towards an apartheid-free nation. Mandela appointed Ollivier as a Grand Officer of the Order of Good Hope in 1995.⁷⁵⁰⁸

The relevance of this story to Platt is that the two men shared many experiences and qualities. Both were extremely wealthy and successful in business; neither had any party political experience but both cared deeply for justice and wanted to end the people's suffering in South Africa. Now consider: If Ollivier had told Prof. Hurst in 1981 that he was going to try to have Nelson Mandela released and bring apartheid to an end by using his contacts, his influence and his money, is it not very possible that that the professor would have diagnosed him as megalomaniac and a saviour type, too? Did Ollivier not think in 1981 exactly the same thing that Pratt thought in 1954, that he would bring about social change by using his influence and status? Prof. Hurst apart, many South Africans in 1981, hearing Ollivier talk about his plans, might have labelled him a megalomaniac with a saviour complex or even mentally disordered, as decades earlier they considered Pratt.

However, Ollivier, like Pratt, was neither power-mad nor crazy and did not see himself as a saviour. Ollivier was determined to put right something that seemed completely wrong in his eyes and gradually, using his contacts, money, status and relationships, he managed to achieve his goal. Pratt did exactly the same things, but he went to the extremes and he failed to achieve his goal, while Ollivier succeeded. If Pratt had somehow succeeded in ending apartheid, he would never have been accused of megalomania or suffering from a saviour type complex. The crucial difference between Pratt and Ollivier, apart from the assault, is that the latter succeeded in his plan to end apartheid, while the former failed.

Like Pratt, who did not want a cabinet seat or financial, or honorific rewards for his efforts, Ollivier remained for a long time in the shadows, and his role in Mandela's release and the ending of apartheid did not become known until recently. The British Independent newspaper characterised him as a “shadowy broker for peace,” and a dazzling array of honours testify to his good works in other parts of the African continent. His titles included “Officier de la Légion d’Honneur” and “Chevalier de l’Ordre Nationale du Mérite” in France, “Commandeur de l’Ordre de Mérite Congolais” in Congo Brazzaville, and “Grand Officier de l’Étoile d’Anjouan” in Comoros.⁷⁵⁰⁹

⁷⁵⁰⁷ Jean-Yves Ollivier in Plot for Peace, 2013.

⁷⁵⁰⁸ Angullo and Jacobson, 2013, Plot for Peace.

Though bereft of public honours, Pratt’s activities on behalf of poor non-White South Africans are evidence of his good will. If he had not cared for the under-privileged, he would not have paid for a school for Black children, nor would he have built apartment homes for his farm workers and their families or given shelter on his farm to poor and homeless non-Whites from elsewhere. He would not have spoken publicly in Britain against apartheid and urged a boycott of South African goods.

As for his attempt to form a coalition government, it reflected a genuine desire to effect political change, based on precedent, that being how the National Party came to power in the first place in 1948. Furthermore, to fill an exercise book for Joe Slovo and the other anti-apartheid activists in prison with “very elaborate and fanciful exhortations for joint efforts against racism”⁷⁵¹⁰ is hardly something a megalomaniac seeking power and recognition would do, but it is the sort of thing that someone who cared about racial injustice would do, someone determined to fight apartheid and bring an end to racism.

True, there was a “mega” aspect to Pratt’s ambitions in the size of his plans, but he had the money, the power and the connections to pursue them realistically. After all, he was able to call and arrange personal meetings with Havenga, Rupert and Oppenheimer, three very influential and powerful men, which very few South Africans were in a position to do. Ollivier’s aims were no less ambitious than Pratt’s, indeed more so, but if he had told Prof. Hurst about them in 1981, it is very likely that he, too, would have been diagnosed as a megalomaniac suffering from grandiose delusions and a saviour complex.

That Pratt believed he would be killed one way or another after his assault but still went ahead with his plan does not mean he was mentally disordered or that he saw himself as a martyr. History is full of people committing desperate acts out of political conviction and that does not mean that they suffered from a martyr complex. Pratt held deep political convictions and was ready to die for them. As he wrote in his letter to Dr. Verwoerd, “It is better for a man to die for a principle than to live in contradiction thereto.” Indeed, only three years later, at the Rivonia Trial, Nelson Mandela expressed his willingness to die for his ideas. Yet, Mandela was never presented as mentally disordered or lampooned as someone who saw himself as a national saviour or martyr. The issue of people willing to die for their ideals is discussed in detail in Chapter Five.

⁷⁵⁰⁹ Steele (The Independent), 13 March 2014, ‘The mysterious Monsieur Jacques: Behind the scenes of apartheid, French businessman Jean-Yves Ollivier was a shadowy broker for peace.’

⁷⁵¹⁰ Slovo, 1995: 133.

There are two other incidents that cast doubt on Prof. Hurst’s diagnosis of a saviour/martyr complex. According to the doctor, Pratt’s delusions and the belief that he had to do something against apartheid started in 1954. However, Pratt was opposed to apartheid long before that. He became a member of the British Liberal Party in the early 1950s and a member of the South African Liberal Party in 1953. Both parties were strongly against apartheid. What is more, he built homes and a school for the Blacks working on his farm and gave shelter to other penniless Blacks in the area, also before 1954. This is the caring man he was, defying apartheid, before 1954 and before the euphoria started. The fact that only a few people knew about Pratt’s generosity seems incompatible with the idea of the delusional, saviour/martyr type portrayed by Prof. Hurst.

We should also remember Dr. Verwoerd believed that he had been chosen by God to lead the Afrikaners and saw himself as a man on a divine mission.⁷⁵¹¹ In addition, after he was shot, Dr. Verwoerd portrayed himself as a self-sacrificial victim, and called himself a “martyr!” He told Major Richter that he was “just one of the martyrs of the Afrikaner people”⁷⁵¹² and then during a visit to his bedside by opposition leader Sir de Villiers Graaff, Dr. Verwoerd referred to God more than a dozen times, insisting that the deity had chosen him to continue piloting apartheid. In the course of a two-hour conversation, he insisted that his survival was proof of the divine acceptance of his policies.⁷⁵¹³ At the same time, Dr. Verwoerd told his wife, “I heard the shots and then I realized that I could still think, and I knew that I had been spared to complete my life’s work.”⁷⁵¹⁴ Betsie Verwoerd also saw her husband’s survival as “a sign to us that we are on the right path and God is with us.”⁷⁵¹⁵

⁷⁵¹¹ Barber, 1999: 161; Bunting, 1986: 147; Sachs, 1965: 7.

⁷⁵¹² Scholtz, 1974: 152-153.

⁷⁵¹³ Vatcher, 1965: 110.

⁷⁵¹⁴ TIME, 16 September 1966, ‘South Africa: Death to the architect.’

⁷⁵¹⁵ Ingalls (The New York Times), 18 April 1960: 1, ‘South Africans said to consider sealing borders.’

In his radio broadcast of May 20, his first public speech after the shooting, Dr. Verwoerd said, “I trust that I will be permitted to testify to my conviction that the protection of Divine Providence was accorded me with a purpose, a purpose which concerns South Africa too. May it be given to me to fulfil that task faithfully.”⁷⁵¹⁶ Dr. Verwoerd later even told Canadian Prime Minister John Diefenbaker that his survival “revealed God’s approval of the cause he had followed.”⁷⁵¹⁷ Finally, as we have already seen Dr. Verwoerd’s followers fully agreed that he had been saved by God in order to fulfil his “duties” and that God had chosen him as his instrument to lead and forge the South African nation.⁷⁵¹⁸ However, no-one at the time, or even now, characterised Dr. Verwoerd as suffering from a “martyr complex” or thought that he might be insane for believing that his life was spared by God because He approved of his policies and wanted him to continue with them.

No matter how convincing Prof. Hurst’s arguments may have appeared, it is difficult to accept that he really believed Pratt was a megalomaniac or saw himself as a saviour of South Africa. What is easier to believe is that he presented Pratt’s various activities and opinions in such a way as to make him appear irrational, which would lessen the prospect of a long term of imprisonment or even the death sentence. The fact that he examined him only once, for two hours, and formulated his opinions from what Pratt himself said without any third party input, suggests that either he was not very professional or that he wanted to save Pratt’s life.

That Professor Hurst was a regular visitor to Pratt’s inn, a good friend of Noel Spiller, and personally opposed to apartheid add to the feasibility of the second option. Even if the Professor did not know Pratt before the examination, he must have known he was co-owner of the inn, if only through his friendship with Spiller. It is natural to assume that Professor Hurst discussed Pratt’s case with Spiller after his examination. He was within his rights to do so in order to collect third-party information on his patient. In such circumstances he would almost certainly have asked Spiller for her opinion about her business partner and would then have learned that Pratt was nothing like the man he described. As we know, Spiller

⁷⁵¹⁶ Pelzer, 1966: 396; The New York Times, 21 May 1960: 11, ‘Dr. Verwoerd asserts God saved his life’; The Sphere, 4 June 1960: 410, ‘The voice of the Common.’

⁷⁵¹⁷ The Globe and Mail, 7 September 1966: 3, ‘Canada regrets death but stand still same’; The Vancouver Sun, 6 September 1966: 3, ‘Verwoerd assassination shocks world leaders.’

⁷⁵¹⁸ TIME, 16 September 1966, ‘South Africa: Death to the architect.’

considered Pratt to be perfectly sane, the worst you could say about him being that he was “eccentric” and had even characterised as a “shrewd businessman.”

As for Professor Hurst’s belief in Pratt’s being megalomaniac, Spiller contradicted the theory with the following characterisation of Pratt’s behaviour among Johannesburg’s powerful people: “I had lot of the Johannesburg nouveau riches, who used to come into the bar and spend hours talking, bragging – wealthy people. But David used to keep pretty aloof, quiet, dignified. He was a very quiet man...”⁷⁵¹⁹ No megalomania there.

Perhaps the strongest indication that the doctor wanted to save Pratt may be deduced from a not dissimilar situation five years later when he was appointed to examine John Harris by the defence lawyers. Prof. Hurst found that Harris “was suffering from a mental disease which rendered him incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong,” and he detected in him “paranoid traits of a nature sufficient to impair his judgment” and therefore render him unfit to stand trial. The court dismissed this diagnosis out of hand and instead accepted the opinion of State psychiatrist Professor van Wyk, who declared Harris to be perfectly sane and fit to stand trial.⁷⁵²⁰

None of those who knew Harris ever said that he was mentally ill or noticed any of the issues mentioned by Prof. Hurst in his diagnosis. It seems that Prof. Hurst either completely misdiagnosed Harris, or more likely, sought to save his life. Admittedly, this is simply theorising and Prof. Hurst might have honestly misdiagnosed both David Pratt and John Harris. That his attitude in these two cases was perhaps more subjective than professional etiquette required cannot be discounted.

Furthermore, two witnesses who knew Pratt well, Elizabeth Radsma and Desmond Blow, both strongly rejected the notion that Pratt was a megalomaniac and saw himself as a martyr/saviour. Radsma, Pratt’s personal assistant, who was very close to him for three and a half years, laughed at the suggestion and characterised Pratt as “a down-to-earth man.” She said, “He was the most humble person I ever met, a true and perfect gentleman. He financially helped a lot of people we did not know about; they only came forward after he died.” As for seeing himself as saviour or martyr, Radsma rejected both characterizations equally strongly.⁷⁵²¹ ⁷⁵¹⁹ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵²⁰ State v. Harris (Appellate Division), 11 February-1 March 1965: 340-341.

⁷⁵²¹ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

Blow totally rejected the “megalomaniac, saviour/martyr” theory. He maintained that Pratt never said anything to him to suggest that he was any of the things Prof. Hurst mentioned. Blow told the author that he “admired Pratt’s courage,” stating that “he was a brave man ... a very concerned man, genuinely concerned about the social injustice that was taking place in South Africa.” Blow said the idea of Pratt as a “saviour/martyr” was not compatible with the man he knew, who he described as a “brave idealist.”⁷⁵²²

Blow’s admiration for this “remarkable and brave, principled man” prompted him to name his son David after Pratt to “honour him” and to “remember him.” Blow’s wife, Elizabeth, told the author that her husband never described Pratt as a “megalomaniac” who saw himself as a “saviour/martyr,” but as someone he deeply admired for his ethics and principles. Mrs. Blow said her husband would never have given their son Pratt’s first name if he considered him to be the type of person described by Prof. Hurst. She said it was immediately after she became pregnant that her husband proposed naming the child David if he was a boy. “He wanted to have David’s name because he admired him so much,” Mrs. Blow said. He intended it “as a compliment to him (Pratt) ... Des wanted in his own way to remember him and that was one way of remembering him with his son having his name.”⁷⁵²³

DR. SOLLY JACOBSON⁷⁵²⁴

The testimony of Dr. Jacobson, a specialist neurologist and psychiatrist, was extremely short. He stated that he had been treating Pratt since November 22, 1958. He performed an electroencephalogram on Pratt which showed “a grossly abnormal condition” and “idiopathic epilepsy.” He testified that Pratt was in no need of a curator bonis while he was under his treatment because he was doing very well. At the same time, he said, Pratt was not a danger to himself or to others, as Dr. Chesler had testified. Finally, he stated that he agreed with Prof. Hurst’s evidence.

⁷⁵²² Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁵²³ Elizabeth Blow in a personal interview, 26 October 2017.

⁷⁵²⁴ Dr. Solly Jacobson’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

DAVID PRATT'S SPEECH⁷⁵²⁵

When Dr. Jacobson finished his testimony, the following exchanges took place:

JUDGE (to Rein): Having heard the evidence, and knowing the history that has been told to you, do you, in your opinion, think that he should be classified under section 5 class 7?

REIN: Yes, that is so.

MAISELS: My lord, that is the evidence I propose placing before the Court on this issue.

At this point, Pratt startled the court by standing up again:

PRATT: My lord, may I make a statement before any verdict is given by you?

JUDGE: Have you considered this with your counsel?

PRATT: I have not discussed it with my counsel, but I just wish to make it without discussion.

MAISELS: My lord, this is an unusual enquiry. Mr. Pratt has a curator ad litem, I would suggest he should discuss it with him, first.

JUDGE: Of course, if he wants to make a statement he is perfectly entitled to do so. (To Pratt) You are perfectly entitled to do so, Mr. Pratt, but don't you want to discuss it with either your counsel or the curator ad litem first?

PRATT: No.

McEWAN: I may say, my lord, that I am aware of the fact that Mr. Pratt wishes to make a statement, I don't know the contents, but I have no objection.⁷⁵²⁶

Pratt then entered the witness box and was advised of the implications and consequences of making a statement under oath. Pratt then took the oath and spoke at length about the background and motives which led to his shooting Dr. Verwoerd.⁷⁵²⁷ The Daily Dispatch reported, "There was complete silence in the court as Pratt spoke and the crowd ⁷⁵²⁵ Pratt's testimony has been taken, unless referenced otherwise, from his testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵²⁶ David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵²⁷ David Pratt's testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Daily Dispatch, 14 September 1960: 1, 'David Pratt tells his story'; The Cape Argus, 14 September 1960: 4, 'Pratt tells of his urge to give message to South Africa'; The New York Times, 14 September 1960, 'Assassin committed.'

leaned forward in close attention to catch every word... Pratt spoke at times very softly, with his voice rising with his excitement. At times he smiled and gestured at the public and at times addressed them almost directly without apparently considering the judge or the rows of counsel in front of him.”⁷⁵²⁸

Pratt said:⁷⁵²⁹

“My lord, I have listened during this hearing to arguments on a subject which is very close to my life. It has aroused certain irritations and I wish to apologise to your lordship for this. My first interruption, I think, was on the epilepsy, the way of life. It is because with the realisation that it is a way of life, that in 1959 when I was in England under psychoanalysis, I accepted certain facts which had been in doubt in me for some years, and which were the cause of a lot of interior conflict within myself. Consequently, when they are debated and argued in detail, they cause irritation, which an individual with a normal E.C.T would not appreciate. That is the explanation for most of my interruptions this morning.

In the statement I am going to make – it is a prepared statement - I want to explain a little of what has led up to today, because to my mind, abnormality in E.C.T. does not in itself represent insanity, my lord. There is a pattern in everything that has taken place, and I see the years from 1954 to now, in retrospect, as a pattern. Therefore, I shall take you briefly through this period. My life up to then had been that of an individual suffering from these abnormal E.C.Ts, having regular seizures.

During 1954, the phases which have been referred to this morning actually occurred. The first phase was to me quite understandable. I was driving my car from Magaliesburg to Krugersdorp and it suddenly occurred. It is very difficult to describe, it may be described, perhaps, as a light being turned on in a dark room. I think that is the way I described it to Doctor Hurst, and I did not understand what was happening, nor did I know that it was only a temporary thing. I was quite unprepared for it.

At any rate, it was a wonderful state in which to be, and I carried on as has been described and gone through with, until I returned to my farm that day and settled down quietly, and in my thoughts there was a question of: "What is this all about? What is happening?" It was during that period of sunset that I received my first intense feeling that it was necessary to go out and give a message.

⁷⁵²⁸ Daily Dispatch, 14 September 1960: 1, ‘David Pratt tells his story.’

⁷⁵²⁹ Unless referenced otherwise, all the parts in David Pratt’s testimony are taken from his testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Well, how could I go out and give a message? I couldn't walk around in the streets, grabbing people by the lapels of their coats and give them a message, nor could I hire Krugersdorp Town Hall - I don't suppose anybody would come - and so I took no notice at the moment. Another day passed and I carried on in the same frame of mind, but the message - the same message - became intensively stronger.

The third day passed and the message was still there. Meanwhile, I fixed everything I had to do and this was beginning to worry me because I had taken no action about it. Then on the fourth day the thing started subsiding again and I returned to normality.

This was a little bit irritating - not irritating, that is the wrong word. It was disappointing because I thought I had got it for ever, and I tried to bring it back again by dieting, and certain exercises, but without success. I then called to see Doctor Geerling and discussed it with him, as been explained in evidence. He asked me to keep in with him whenever it occurred again, because I must appreciate, he said, this was also an illness.

Well, it occurred within a month or six weeks later. It began much the same way except I was not in the car, I was at the farm, and this time it became infinitely more intense, and the message was infinitely stronger than before, and I immediately rang Doctor Geerling and told him it was back, and he asked me to keep in continual touch with him, whenever I needed, at any hour of the day or night.

It was during this episode that the auditory hallucinations referred to occurred, and it was continuous hallucinations, more strong at night than during the day. It was continuous for twenty four hours. The same sense of mission to give South Africa a particular message became stronger and stronger, and I still took no action, and it slowly became higher and higher, and I still took no action. I was busy at the time, I think, reorganising things with my sweet factory and other matters, and tried to keep this in the background, but it remained. And then it rose higher, to a degree where Doctor Hurst refers to feeling disembodied. At that stage Doctor Geerling advised me to come to Tara and injections and Sanitoria followed, as has been explained in detail. Personally, I think the violence etcetera had quite a lot to do with the injections, which were ineffective. That is an opinion.

Then again after my discharge a period elapsed, and then once more the exact same euphoria returned with the identical message to be given to South Africa. And the third time I thought: "This cannot be! Something has got to be done," though I was still without a forum, I was still without any means of conveying it, and no explanation of how to convey it was given. So that was the reason why I decided to try to form a coalition Government, and which you have heard, was not successful. After this ceased, the euphoria also died back to normal and the intense sense of mission also left me at that time.

I then tried to continue in a normal way of life as usual but this I found impossible because I began to lose interest in all those things in which I had been fascinated before, my herd, my work, even my wife and family, and periods of depression became more and more acute. Therefore I came up from the Cape to a Sanatoria and even had an E.C.T. on the occasion of one of the depressions, it was so severe. I then developed an urticarial which I could not cure until I cleared out of South Africa. It then got better within forty eight hours and it never recurred. My wife suggested that we move to Europe but I had too many obligations, and all my interests and my love was in South Africa, which I consider to be the finest country I know. I know of no better.

Well, I sold my herd, which was one of the leading herds in the country, and then we went to Europe. We looked around but there was no country other than South Africa which I wished to live, so I refused to consider the thing. I was however, prepared to consider moving to the Cape, which was still South Africa. I therefore came back and purchased the farm 'Old Sillery' in Constantia.

At this time, I had left my wife and children in Holland. She had also been, obviously, very perturbed over the depression into which I had come, though this was not very much distressed. On my return to Europe to bring them back, there were attempts to introduce me into a Roman Catholic way of life and I was taken to Lourdes, but instead of doing there what I should have done I suppose, I went off to a bull fight instead. Later I returned to South Africa, leaving my wife and family to return in December. To my amazement, I received a telegram just before they should have sailed stating that, on psychological advice, they were staying there, and they have remained there since, apart from a short visit here a little while ago.

It was then following this I felt my depressions growing deeper and deeper, because I had a personal guilt in my mind for everything that was going wrong in South Africa.

Because, I had not given this message as I was meant to give it, these things would not have gone wrong if that message had been taken, and who was I to say the message would not have been taken? I only know that I didn't give it, and the troubles that I felt would follow, did follow, and followed increasingly. The sense of guilt brought my depression to a stage where I felt, periodically that life was no longer worth living, and as you know from certain exhibits here, the basic reason behind the three suicidal attempts -- I think they have been put in -- if I am being truth, I don't know.

(According to the Daily Dispatch, at this point Pratt paused and looked round the court, smiling broadly, before going on).⁷⁵³⁰

On each occasion something unexpected occurred at the last moment, just as I was ready to prevent it, and after it had happened three times, the conviction grew in me that I wasn't going to be allowed to commit suicide; that whether I am off to another country, that whether I tried to commit suicide, whatever I tried to do, the sense of guilt would remain until the message I had been told to give was given.

Then I went to Europe last year and returned to South Africa just after Mr. Macmillan left - we passed his boat - and I arrived in Cape Town as Cape Town was still busy discussing his speech. I had left a booming Europe, I had left a progressive Europe, and I had been defending South Africa on the boat coming back and describing to my fellow passengers that a lot of what they were going to see was a lot of 'hooey' and false press publicity.

On my arrival in Cape Town, I was horrified at the disintegration that had taken place in South Africa during the period I had been away, the sense of hopelessness on people's faces, the apathy, or alternatively, selling up, packing up and clearing out, which is no answer. Simultaneously, the Press were full of riots, details of which I need not go into.

I came up to the Transvaal to my farm. If you will all cast your minds back to March of last year, the position was intense and acute to a fantastic degree throughout South Africa. In the area in which I was living, Magaliesburg, was not completely free from isolated incidents, apart from the major quarrels.

I ran away to the South Coast, as Mrs. Spiller has told you. I was down there for a few days, and she was worried about me...I was more worried about South Africa than she was worried about me. Then I returned, for I had difficulties with my manganese company factory and other things, which had to be attended to, for it had been my intention to return to London, not to live, but to continue this psychoanalytic treatment which I had been taking. Unfortunately, I could not get away, partly because of my own business difficulties, but mainly because of the situation in South Africa, and it gripped me internally to a point in which I felt too clear: Now what can be done? It was then also, that I very nearly did my last suicide attempt, which Father Orsmond talked me out of.

⁷⁵³⁰ Daily Dispatch, 14 September 1960: 11, 'Pratt tells his own story.'

Then the Emergency Regulations were passed and I felt - for nearly twelve years or more the vote in South Africa has really meant less and less - at least one could speak and at least one could write, and now that has stopped, and what is there left to stop the bottle bursting? On a Thursday, I am sure it was a Thursday, I passed a pickup van loaded with detained prisoners. Then I saw another van being loaded with women prisoners. When I passed the detainees, I think I was with Mr. Zulman of the Durban Confectionery and the impression upon me became even more intense, coupled with the feeling of guilt for not carrying out what I should have done in 1954.”

(According to the Daily Dispatch, at the reference to detainees being loaded into lorries, Susan Pratt bit her lower lip, apparently fighting back tears.⁷⁵³¹)

It is true I had occasion to be carrying a gun during this period because a lot of people were carrying guns. Nevertheless, I had not had a gun with me on Friday, and on Saturday, when I went to the Showgrounds with my manager (two young boys were staying with me, had come up for the weekend) I slipped a revolver in my pocket. I normally took it, always, if I was going to be very late back. There was no definite intention of being back late on the Saturday and I cannot really say why it was slipped then into my pocket except that I certainly had no fixed intention of shooting the Prime Minister. It was only a few hours before I knew he was going to speak, anyway, and, of course, I had been carrying one on odd days. Nevertheless, I felt I had to take my revolver and I took it and I have thought for five months: “Why did you have to take your revolver on Saturday?” and I cannot get an exact answer to that.

At the Showgrounds I left my companions at the cattle exhibit and went along to the ring and watched the jumping. From that section you have heard everything described very vividly and many witnesses have been through it, and I think it is unnecessary for me to go through it again, expect to say that I felt this violent urge to shoot “apartheid,” the stinking monster of apartheid that was gripping the throat of South Africa and preventing South Africa from achieving her rightful place amongst nations. But I did not fully associate that with the Prime Minister.

⁷⁵³¹ Daily Dispatch, 14 September 1960: 1, ‘David Pratt tells his story.’

I got into the cattle ring - they were judging the Gold Cup at the time - to talk to some friends, and while there I remembered an accident that had taken place, years ago, to me, while clipping an animal, in which my whole cheek was smashed in and I was laid up for some time. And the thought that if I hit the Prime Minister on the identical spot and maimed him for the same period of time that I was maimed, it would at least give him an opportunity to reconsider some of the things that had been taking place.

It was sufficient, this feeling, to deaden my anti-assassination feelings against the urge to shoot and on that I went up and shot. And that, really, is all there is to it.

I then stood and waited for something to happen. The seconds, however long they were, seemed like an hour. If it had been my intention to kill him, I could have emptied every bullet in the chamber immediately into his head. There were five or six bullets, I think. The second bullet, which penetrated here (indicating) occurred when my arm was jerked and that, I think, was the more severe of the two injuries.

From the time I was taken away I started feeling an immense feeling of release, and irrespective of what happened to me this afternoon, the bruises meant nothing. The arguments, the discussions were nothing at all. All I was concerned with was there was release from tension that had been building up more, and more, and more heavily from 1954 to 1960.

When eventually I was finished with the police and the psychiatrists and the doctors, when I came to the cell, I had a couple of blankets, not even a mattress on that first night or a pillow, but I had the best night's sleep I had had for six years, a wonderful night! From that period until now, with the break of course for the preliminary examination, the preliminary hearing on July the 20th, for I think, two days, I have spent my time in an isolation cell, in a cell by myself with limited exercise (for me) - half an hour in the morning and a half an in the afternoon. Occasionally, a few months ago, I used to get special times to sit in the sun, but on the whole it has been five months of isolation under conditions which I had never experienced in my life before.

But I can say, as I do - I am under oath - that those last five months have been one hundred times happier than those last five years, irrespective of the travail, the scheme, the what have you, and there is no doubt that the only thing worth having is freedom of mind - the freedom of body doesn't matter a damn! If you live under guilt you are never free. If you know you must do something that you do not do, you are not free, and freedom is the only thing worth fighting for. "Only" is perhaps not the word, but is the first thing of which one must fight. But freedom is a dangerous liquor, very heady, and if drunk in excess leaves complete chaos, and it is because it is worth so much that it is so heady and must be taken in very tiny doses until one gets used to it, until one accustoms oneself to something one has not tasted. It is useless to cry for the moon when you can't even fly up to the first branch of a tree, but these are matters on which I will not philosophise on now. All I know is that from April the 9th to September the 15th has been the most wonderful experience of life and I will not exchange it for anything.

Then the Prime Minister got well. Doctor Snyman's report has not been put in as yet, but I have seen it. And to me, his recovery reads, virtually, as a miracle. I don't know what Doctor Snyman has to say or what the Prime Minister has to say, but he is a very, very lucky man, and I regard his recovery virtually as a miracle. Because it all fits into the pattern that has existed from 1954 until now.

I was told to speak, I was told I could not speak, I answered I cannot speak, I have nowhere to speak from. I was told...I must not say 'I was told.' I mean I felt that I had to do something and I tried, therefore, a coalition Government. That did not succeed. Then I ran from corner to corner trying to evade what was still in my mind, and getting a more and more intense feeling.

Then, after the shooting of the Prime Minister and his recovery I have the box in which I can speak to you, and I can tell you now what I should have told you in 1954. And everything from now, looking back to 1954 in retrospect, to me, fits into a pattern, and though it has taken me years to accept that pattern, today I accept it with deep humility, that I am allowed to say what I myself am convinced is the message for South Africa.

I don't say it of my own accord, and I don't say it as David Pratt, I say it as a message for every South African, Afrikaner, English South African, Coloured, Indian, Bantu, Malay. Every person in South Africa has got to play his part if we are to build the South Africa that I knew can be built. When I say 'I' you will appreciate that it is the 'I' of the 'I feel' that I refer to. 'South Africa has got to come out of her wilderness' was the first message I felt in 1954. She has got to take her rightful place in the community of nations and in particular the continent of Africa. She is the finest country in this continent and there is no better in the world and she is capable of doing it, and she can do it, and she has a great and glorious future, a glittering future waiting for her as long as she observes the basic laws of God and human dignity, which of course, means, in the words, I think, of Macmillan at the time, 'Rule by merit and not pigment of skin.'"

(At this point, according to the Rand Daily Mail, Pratt showed signs of emotion when he threw up his arms and spoke.⁷⁵³²)

South Africa has to throw off the slimy snake apartheid which is gripping its throat. Practical apartheid, obviously, cannot go immediately. The principle of apartheid has to be flung off, and then it is out, and then it is up to the coloured section of the population how rapidly the practical section is put into effect. As I have said, it depends upon their capability of taking very heady alcohol.

Secondly, she has to stop her policy of world isolation which will carry her into the depths of the wilderness and never to the Promised Land. It is time for her to wake and to realise the future that is in front of her, to realise as I now do, after six years of watching the pattern taking place. I realise what can take place in this country and what will take place - of this there is no question - once the simple initial plunge is taken and nationalism is thrown out!

Your future lies before you. If you are worthy of it - this I say to the people of South Africa - you take it. If you are not worthy of it, well, at least I shall never feel guilty again. Thank you, my lord, that is all I have to say this afternoon."

During Pratt's oration, Judge Rumpff had mostly stared at the papers in front of him. When Pratt finished, he turned to the prosecutor and said, "Mr Rein, you don't want to ask any questions, do you?"⁷⁵³³ At the same time, Leslie Lawrence from Pratt's team, looked at ⁷⁵³² Maisels, 1998: 105.

⁷⁵³³ Maisels, 1998: 105-106.

Maisels and his other colleagues and said, "This doesn't appear to be a man who is insane, who could be so eloquent and so clear on his facts."⁷⁵³⁴

Despite Pratt's speech, Maisels then stated that on the strength of the evidence, he wished to apply to have Pratt committed to a mental institution at the Governor-General's pleasure, but he understood that the Crown was going to apply for him to be sent to such an institution for observation. He had no wish to oppose the Crown's application, he said, since it could be in the interests of his client. Judge Rumpff said, "On the information put before me, I have reason to think that the accused may be mentally disordered and if that is so, the application must be granted, and I direct therefore that an inquiry be held in terms of the Act. I feel inclined to send him for observation for a period of, say, 14 days." The judge ordered that Pratt be committed to the Weskoppies mental institution for the period of observation. He then adjourned the hearing until September 26.⁷⁵³⁵

COMMENTS ON PRATT'S SPEECH

Pratt's speech stunned its listeners. His counsel had advised that he should not "speak up for freedom" in court because it could harm his case. Pratt did in fact mention freedom and later said he wished he had said even more.⁷⁵³⁶ The crowded court appeared transfixed as Pratt, supposedly a mentally disordered man, spoke coherently, indeed elegantly, about the national situation and his personal reactions to it. Noel Spiller, though well aware of Pratt's sanity, nevertheless characterised the speech as a "wonderful address."⁷⁵³⁷

However, when Judge Rumpff referred to Pratt's intervention two weeks later, at the conclusion of the trial, he said, "I do not wish to deal in detail with the speech Pratt made when he gave evidence. The manner in which he made his speech, his demeanour and the explanation of his motives for the attack on the prime minister give one the impression that the balance of his mind has been affected."⁷⁵³⁸ Judge Rumpff's statement suggests that either ⁷⁵³⁴ Leslie Lawrence in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵³⁵ Judge Rumpff's Judgement in Regina vs David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵³⁶ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Prof. Lamont's psychiatric report on David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵³⁷ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵³⁸ Judge Rumpff's Judgement in Regina vs David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

he had a closed mind with regard to Pratt's arguments or he had no idea what was happening in South Africa at the time.

Pratt's speech, as his advocate Lawrence immediately pointed out, was both eloquent and clear on the facts. On paper, it reads like the political manifesto of a man, who, like Demetrio Tsafendas, has strong political convictions and is determined to bring change to South Africa without consideration of the cost to himself. Speaking boldly but realistically, Pratt is saying that all South Africans should play a part in the future of South Africa. He talks about freedom which he clearly longs for and the necessity to end apartheid and nationalism, and he concludes by quoting Harold Macmillan's advice that South Africa should be ruled "by merit and not pigment of skin." Were these the words of a mad man?

Pratt also explains his medical condition and states correctly that being epileptic is not the same as being mentally disordered or abnormal. As for his euphoric phases, these were caused by his medication, something he could have explained better.

It seems clear from Pratt's impassioned delivery that he is a man "deeply concerned about justice and poverty," as Fr. Orsmond characterised him, that he feels guilty about apartheid, cannot pretend it does not exist and feels he must do something about it. He demonstrates his determination to fight the racial system by joining the South African and the British Liberal parties, by trying to form a coalition to defeat the ruling National Party and by publicly urging the British to boycott South African goods. When he concludes that he has not achieved anything really meaningful, his depression and guilt grow stronger.

Pratt said, "If you live under guilt, you are never free. If you know you must do something that you do not do, you are not free, and freedom is the only thing worth fighting for." Could such moral self-awareness come from the mind of a deluded man? Every decent White South African at the time of apartheid who was not fighting it outright would have felt the way Pratt did. It was the natural emotion of a concerned and compassionate man who believed that all men should enjoy justice and equality.

Pratt then talks jubilantly about the months since the shooting being the happiest in his life. Why? Because he got rid of the guilt he suffered through inaction by finally doing something for freedom. It should be noted here that Pratt became something of a hero among some anti-apartheid activists who loved to quote him saying, "If you know you must do something, and you don't do it, you are not free." His attack on the person he considered "the epitome of apartheid" had evidently set him free.⁷⁵³⁹

The incident he mentioned in his speech, of seeing prisoners, including women, being bundled into police vans, had a profound effect on him, as had the Sharpeville massacre, leading in both cases to depression, but also to anger.⁷⁵⁴⁰ It is fair to assume that a great many men would have been similarly affected by such sights and eager to react. Pratt had the courage to do so.

In his address to the court, Pratt made it plain that it was the sight of those men and women being taken away that convinced him the time had come to act. It was also the conclusion of years of watching deterioration in South African society. As he wrote in his letter to Dr. Verwoerd, he became depressed seeing "the hopelessness in faces, the fear to talk," and the decisions by the weaker ones to leave.⁷⁵⁴¹ This was no delusion or megalomaniac dream; these were the facts that finally persuaded Pratt to act.

As for the "message" he says he received in 1954 and how it constantly recurred, that is something that will be discussed in detail shortly. However, it should be stated here that it was not this vision or hallucination that turned him into an enemy of apartheid. He was already deeply antipathetic to the ruling system. Professor of Psychology Alban Burke stated, "The human brain does not create new information out of nothing." The urge to do something against apartheid pre-existed.⁷⁵⁴²

Pratt's speech is one of the most honest and courageous political statements made in a court in South Africa during the era of apartheid. It should be taught in history lessons in schools around the world. British-South African actor and playwright Sir Antony Sher described Pratt as "a very intelligent, very eloquent and clearly politically motivated man trying to kill Dr. Verwoerd for really clear reasons. At his trial he made an amazing speech, which is heart-rending because he really believed that he was trying to do good for South Africa."⁷⁵⁴³

⁷⁵³⁹ Du Preez, 2008: 167.

⁷⁵⁴⁰ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁵⁴¹ Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

⁷⁵⁴² Professor Alban Burke in a personal interview, 4 April 2016.

⁷⁵⁴³ Unsworth (Sunday Times), 21 September 2003, 'A play about assassination, a tapeworm and notions of madness.'

COMMENTS ON THE INQUIRY INTO PRATT'S MENTAL HEALTH

None of the defence witnesses testified that Pratt was mad. Dr. Chesler argued that he was unable to look after his affairs, but that was based on a diagnosis two years earlier, and the doctor declined to comment on Pratt's current condition. He even admitted that his diagnosis could have been wrong. Spiller and Radsma, who knew Pratt very well, both rejected Dr. Chesler's opinion as to Pratt's capabilities. Radsma claimed that all the defence witnesses exaggerated Pratt's condition and various incidents involving him in order to help him. The author cannot know whether this applied to Dr. Chesler or any other doctor, as Radsma was talking about Pratt's friends, but it is certainly possible that the doctors did something similar.

Fr. Orsmond, Radsma and Spiller stated flatly after the trial that Pratt was perfectly sane. Radsma and Spiller said many defence witnesses found themselves in a difficult position because they were asked to support the insanity plea, but would have had to lie to do so. According to Radsma, they exaggerated and embroidered some incidents in an effort to support the insanity plea, since they could not bring themselves to lie.

None of the witnesses referred to Pratt's political ideas or his hatred of Dr. Verwoerd and apartheid. Only the fact that he had attempted to form a coalition was mentioned, but this was already known to the doctors who had examined him.

An important issue in Pratt's life which received little serious attention at the inquiry was his euphoria. None of those who mentioned it, including the doctors, explained the episodes sufficiently clearly for a lay listener to understand what was going on, although Prof. Hurst testified that Pratt's medication for the epilepsy "might have been responsible for some aspects of his mental state." Perhaps this avoidance was intentional. However, no-one claimed that Pratt was schizophrenic or psychotic because of the euphoria, probably because they were aware that his condition was a side-effect of his medication.

PRATT'S INTERRUPTIONS IN THE COURT

The following exchange took place between Rein and Prof. Hurst regarding Pratt's interruptions in the Court:

REIN: The interruptions of Mr. Pratt that we have had yesterday and today, were they calm and collected interruptions?

HURST: They were calm. My own opinion is that they showed lack of judgment in not leaving these matters to counsel at the particular time. My knowledge, limited as it is of legal procedure, makes me question his judgment in not leaving his defence to counsel.

REIN: They were calm?

HURST: Yes they were calm.

REIN: Relevant?

HURST: I can't judge that really.

REIN: They were not irrelevant, were they? They had to do with the subject matter that was being discussed at the time?

HURST: For all that, the context strongly suggests that the megalomania of which I had first-hand evidence on that night is still present.

REIN: Do you regard these interruptions as a manifestation of his megalomania?

HURST: I think that is probable.⁷⁵⁴⁴

Pratt's interruptions seem to be the natural reactions of a man who hears things about himself which are not true and is eager to correct them. All of his reactions were relevant to the matters under consideration, demonstrating that he was able to follow the course of the proceedings and comment appropriately. Interrupting court proceedings is certainly not a recommended course of action but it tends to happen when a defendant or witness wishes to correct or explain a statement or situation, and it certainly does not mean that the person concerned is mentally disordered.

Pratt's interventions were controlled and polite, each time in order to set the record straight. As for being manifestations of his megalomania, as Prof. Hurst suggested, this seems seriously overstated. If a man believes himself to be misrepresented and misunderstood, it seems perfectly reasonable that he should step in to clear his name. He may be impulsive and excited but as in Pratt's case, this was a very long way from megalomania. A final point: Pratt was alert and ready to make an intervention because he knew that his lawyers would do nothing about any misrepresentations for fear they contradicted the defence line.

⁷⁵⁴⁴ Prof. Hurst's testimony in the Enquiry regarding the mental condition of David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

PRATT WANTING TO GIVE AWAY HIS POSSESSIONS

Robert Charter and Dr. Chesler testified that Pratt wanted to give away all his possessions so as to find peace of mind. According to Radsma, who, as Pratt's secretary was privy to much of his thinking, that was only half of the story. She said Pratt did not intend to give away everything he owned, he planned to divest himself of his business, his properties and a large amount of his bank deposits. However, he intended to keep enough in the bank so that he could live without having to work. Radsma said Pratt had two reasons for this proposed action. One was that he felt he would have no peace of mind as long as he had so many responsibilities and while he suffered from epilepsy and occasional depression. The other was that he felt enormous guilt that he had all these comforts while so many people were poor and starving.⁷⁵⁴⁵ Doreen Billson, Pratt's former girlfriend, said the same thing as Radsma: that Pratt told her he wanted to get rid of all his businesses and settle in a quiet cottage in England, away from all the responsibilities, so as to find peace of mind.⁷⁵⁴⁶

That Pratt wanted to give away his possessions was not the thinking of a madman, but reflected the scruples of a man of high morals who was sensitive to the sufferings of others. The sanity of the Christian apostles who gave up everything to follow Jesus is not questioned and two thousand years later, the same thing is still happening. There are numerous examples of people surrendering their wealth in order to get away from their responsibilities and find peace of mind. For example, in 2010, Austrian millionaire Karl Rabeder gave away his £3 million fortune when he realised that his riches were making him miserable.⁷⁵⁴⁷ Liu Jingchong, a Chinese multi-millionaire, gave away his fortune and became a monk.⁷⁵⁴⁸ Brian Burnie, a British multi-millionaire, divested himself of his possession in 2014 as his wife was recovering from cancer.⁷⁵⁴⁹

⁷⁵⁴⁵ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁵⁴⁶ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷⁵⁴⁷ Samuel (The Telegraph), 8 February 2010, 'Multimillionaire gives away fortune that made him miserable.' Retrieved from <http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/europe/austria/7190750/Millionaire-gives-away-fortune-that-made-him-miserable.html>

⁷⁵⁴⁸ Malm (The Daily Mail) 10 August 2015, 'Millionaire businessman gives up his possessions to become a Buddhist monk in China after living in isolation for two years.' Retrieved from: <http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3192464/Millionaire-businessman-gives-possessions-Buddhist-monk-China-living-isolation-two-years.html>

⁷⁵⁴⁹ Aldridge (The Mirror), 20 September 2014, 'The multimillionaire who gave away £16M ...' Retrieved from: <http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/uk-news/multi-millionaire-who-gave-away-16m-4296584>

In Frank Capra's 1936 movie, Mr. Deeds Goes to Town, the hero, Mr. Deeds, begins to give away his fortune to the poor. His relatives and Trust members take him to court to seek a ruling that he is mentally disordered, as any man must be who gives away a fortune. Deeds proves he is perfectly sane and proceeds to dispose of his assets as he wishes. Although fiction, the story carries echoes of Pratt's case, where wanting to give away your possessions is wrongly assumed to be a sign of insanity.

PRATT IN COURT AGAIN

Pratt reappeared in the Supreme Court in Pretoria, on Monday, September 26, 1960. The only witness was the State-appointed psychiatrist, Professor Austin Lamont, Physician Superintendent of Weskoppies Mental State Hospital and Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Pretoria, who had observed Pratt in the hospital from September 13. The Professor had also scrutinised his medical records and spoken to five people who knew Pratt to hear opinions about him. To get a broader picture, he interviewed people who had different relationships with him. They were: two relatives, a secretary, Pratt's former general practitioner and Fr. Orsmond.⁷⁵⁵⁰ Prof. Lamont stated that in his opinion Pratt was "mentally disordered and an epileptic," as well as a danger to himself and others.⁷⁵⁵¹ At these proceedings, Pratt appeared tense in a way that he did not at previous appearances.⁷⁵⁵²

PROF. LAMONT'S PSYCHIATRIC REPORT ON PRATT⁷⁵⁵³

Professor Lamont observed Pratt from September 13 to 25. He kept a detailed diary of Pratt's activities, responses to his questions and his general behaviour and attitude. He read his report to the court:

PRATT'S BEHAVIOUR

Prof. Lamont said Pratt was "extremely polite and co-operative and his mood was one of euphoria, combined with ecstasy. He appeared to have no anxiety regarding his predicament. He exercised enthusiastically while at Weskoppies and showered afterwards, in a manner not expected of a man of his age (fifty). Pratt answered questions readily, showing no anxiety. He explained his relaxation as marking the completion of what he described as a "six-year pattern." While in this euphoric state, he read passages from a diary kept during the latter part of his time awaiting trial. Pratt admitted to experiencing mood swings during the past six ⁷⁵⁵⁰ Prof. Lamont's report about David Pratt: Accused reaction to information gleaned from documents, friends, relatives and employees in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵⁵¹ Prof. Lamont's psychiatric report on David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960, The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵⁵² Daily Dispatch, 27 September 1960: 1, 'No trial for David Pratt.'

⁷⁵⁵³ All the parts of Prof. Lamont's testimony are taken from Prof. Lamont's psychiatric report on David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960, The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA, unless referenced otherwise.

years. He ended his first interview with Prof. Lamont in a highly emotional vein, saying, "No hard feelings."

JUDAS

Prof. Lamont read out a reference in Pratt's diary to Dr. Verwoerd's recovery as being analogous to Christ's Resurrection and to seeing himself in the role of his betrayer, Judas Iscariot. Pratt claimed to have a "sneaking regard" for Judas in view of his important contribution to Christianity.

COMMENTS ON PROF. LAMONT'S ABOVE TESTIMONY

Pratt's reference to Judas was an apt one, clearly relevant to his situation. He knew that just as Judas betrayed Christ, he, Pratt, was seen by most white South Africans as betraying his country. His experience in prison and in the hospital left him in no doubt that he was widely seen as a traitor. South Africa's Whites found it difficult to accept that "one of them," especially someone so wealthy and privileged, would shoot the man they worshipped. There was even widespread speculation that Pratt could be charged with treason.⁷⁵⁵⁴

THE EPILEPTIC ATTACK

On September 20, a week into his observation period, a male nurse witnessed Pratt suffering from an attack of le grand mal. Prof. Lamont arrived fifteen minutes later and found Pratt still seriously confused. "He could not say where he was and could not say who I was. Twenty minutes later, he remembered my name with difficulty, saying that I was the doctor who was going to operate on him." Pratt was surprised when Prof. Lamont told him later that he had had a fit.

⁷⁵⁵⁴ Prof. Lamont's psychiatric report on David Beresford Pratt in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA; Daily Dispatch, 11 April 1960: 1, 'Could be charged with treason'; Daily Mail, 27 September 1960: 7, 'Pratt's Daughter Sees Him Sent to Jail.'

COMMENTS ON PROF. LAMONT'S ABOVE TESTIMONY

According to Susan Pratt, the defence team deliberately withheld Pratt's anti-epilepsy medication to prove that he was epileptic and mentally disordered. It was this, she said, which caused him to have that seizure.⁷⁵⁵⁵ Of course that does not mean that Pratt could not have had an epileptic fit anyway, but clearly on this occasion, denying him his medication played a role.

PRATT'S SUSPICION ABOUT THE STAFF

Pratt told Prof. Lamont that he was suspicious of the male nursing staff, who he named "warders." He was peevish and provocative with them and once asked a nurse to taste his tea to see if it was poisoned. Prof. Lamont said:

"He became very sarcastic towards the nurses and myself. The whole day he harangued us, saying 'the whole set-up is phoney from top to bottom.' He was fidgety and interfered with everybody and everything in sight and said his telephone calls were being obstructed as part of a 'frame-up.' He refused to sign for petty cash and grabbed one of the patients he was with in a manner inviting retaliation and seemed oblivious to any danger.

He was seen interfering with another patient who was completely inaccessible (mentally) and ignored warnings. That night, he remained in this provocative mood and the next morning threatened two senior nurses with violence. He said, 'Everybody seems to be pulling my leg. It is a sort of exaggeration of my wife's behaviour from 1957 onwards.' He concluded that his wife had 'some sort of hand in this set-up.'"

Two days later, the Professor found Pratt calm and amenable. He admitted that his wife could have had no possible influence on the hospital staff, but then said impulsively, "My wife needs a good hiding."

COMMENTS ON PROF. LAMONT'S ABOVE TESTIMONY

What is surprising about this part of Prof. Lamont's report is that he makes Pratt's apprehensions appear abnormal, when they were perfectly understandable. Pratt had just shot a Prime Minister who was deified by most White South Africans. He was widely hated and ⁷⁵⁵⁵ Susan Pratt in a personal interview, 2 May 2015.

perceived as a traitor, while the possibility that he might escape hanging had added to the public anger. Pratt had every reason to fear that he might be poisoned or end up “committing suicide,” as he well knew had happened to others who were in custody. Far from being paranoid, his suspicions while in the hands of a brutal regime seem entirely justified. Pratt was also aware that his defence team and the State, for different reasons, wanted to find him mentally disordered. It seems entirely natural that someone in Pratt’s position would have been suspicious of those around him.

PRATT’S TATTOO

Prof. Lamont commented on a tattoo which a fellow prisoner had designed on Pratt’s right forearm while he was awaiting trial. This consisted of crossed swords with the dates 9.4.60 and 12.9.60 above and below and the letters V and P. Pratt explained that the dates spelled out the period of his incarceration, the V stood for Dr. Verwoerd and P for Pratt. According to Prof. Lamont, the emotional tone in which Pratt chatted about his tattoo was out of keeping with what one would expect from an individual of his educational and social background.

OTHER ISSUES

- When the professor noticed blisters on Pratt’s right foot, Pratt explained that they were caused by running in prison shoes without socks. On the second day in Weskoppies, Pratt complained that the hospital clothing hampered his running exercises.
- Pratt expressed resentment at the publicity given to Professor Hurst’s findings about him because he considered they would be detrimental to his family’s welfare.
- Prof. Lamont revealed that Pratt had once written to the Queen of England complaining about a charge of 2s. 6d. for admission to St. George’s Chapel at Windsor Castle.
- The professor also mentioned something that had been reported by the British press, but not in South Africa, that Pratt had become involved in a political campaign in London and had spoken at Hyde Park on behalf of the Liberal Party. However, there was no mention of his anti-apartheid activities while in England, although it is possible that Pratt did not mention them.

Prof. Lamont’s report also said:

“Throughout the whole period of observation, the undercurrent of grandiose delusional trend, exemplified by his saviour/martyr role, remained fixed. He refused even to consider the possibility that euphoria and depression can be abnormal psychic phenomena associated with epilepsy. And he insists that his rationalisations in terms of religious and political topics are real and meaningful. The suspicion, peevishness and egocentricity shown from the second day onwards, are typical of the so-called ‘epileptic temperament.’ These attributes, together with his impulsiveness and moodiness, could lead to unpredictable behaviour, which would strain business and domestic associations because they are, in my opinion, an attempt to cope with his environment at a psychotic level.

During recent years, the history suggests an eccentric preoccupation with religious and political topics. The abnormal electroencephalographic findings give a clue to the underlying brain abnormality, the highest expression of which is the epileptic seizure. In this case, in my opinion, it is not possible to exclude the possibility that the periodic behavioural disturbances are associated with minor exacerbations of brain abnormality. In my opinion, the findings during the period of observation clearly categorise him as mentally disordered and epileptic.”

Prof. Lamont’s conclusion was, “In my opinion, the findings clearly show him as mentally disordered and an epileptic.” He added that Pratt’s indifference to his predicament, his compelling preoccupation with exercise and his behaviour throughout were consistent with the behaviour of a person suffering from epilepsy, and the undercurrent of grandiose delusions further supported this. His tendency to minimise his trouble was an indication he was completely out of touch with reality. Summing up all the evidence, observations and findings of others, Prof. Lamont said that his only finding was that Pratt was mentally disordered and that he was an epileptic within the meaning of the Mental Disorders Act.

ESPECIALLY CHOSEN

Prof. Lamont said that on September 19, Pratt appeared before a medical conference, when he stated that he was “especially chosen to save South Africa.” He said that the shooting of Dr. Verwoerd was the culmination of a pattern which had started in 1954, but he now felt that the statement he had made in the Supreme Court on September 13 was in fact the climax. He said that he had written to Dr. Verwoerd but had no reply, adding that all this publicity could have been avoided if he and Dr. Verwoerd had a chat. Pratt said he fully expected to be killed or executed, adding that to be sent to a mental hospital for life would be equal to the death sentence.

COMMENTS ON PROF. LAMONT'S ABOVE TESTIMONY

According to Prof. Lamont, Pratt saw himself as the chosen saviour of the country. If this was a delusion, the fact that he despised apartheid and considered that the country needed to be rescued from it was no delusion. He had long thought in those terms, independent of any euphoria or hallucinations. Professor Alban Burke stated that, "the human brain does not create new information out of nothing." In other words, Pratt had long determined to act on his beliefs and if he received or thought he received a "message," that was simply the trigger. Nobody wakes up one day and decides out of the blue that he is going to fight apartheid; the idea already exists in his mind, but some word or action or thought might well trigger the execution of this idea.⁷⁵⁵⁶ We should remember that Pratt's euphoria and delusions were caused by his medication, without which he was perfectly normal.

Some of Pratt's comments at the medical conference do not fit his character and it seems likely that he spoke as he did to support the insanity plea at his daughter's request. According to Elizabeth Radsma, Pratt would never have described himself as the saviour of the country because he was a modest man; if he did make that remark, she believed it was a deliberate lie intended to support the insanity plea which his daughter Susan was begging him to accept.⁷⁵⁵⁷ Desmond Blow told the author that Pratt never saw himself as a "saviour" of South Africa. Rather than a national saviour, Blow saw Pratt as "a brave idealist."⁷⁵⁵⁸ Blow also always maintained that Pratt was "very sane" and that he had a "brilliant mind."⁷⁵⁵⁹

There are two other issues which cast doubt on Prof. Lamont's diagnosis and which support Radsma's claim. According to the doctor, Pratt's delusions and the belief that he had to do something against apartheid started in 1954. However, Pratt was opposed to apartheid long before that. He became a member of the British Liberal Party in the early 1950s and a member of the South African Liberal Party in 1953. Both parties were strongly against apartheid. What is more, he built homes and a school for the Black families working on his ⁷⁵⁵⁶ Professor Alban Burke in a personal interview, 12 April 2016.

⁷⁵⁵⁷ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁵⁵⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁵⁵⁹ Elizabeth Blow, in a personal interview, 26 October 2017; Graham David Blow in a personal interview, 22 October 2017.

farm and gave shelter to other penniless Blacks in the area, also before 1954. This is the caring man he was, defying apartheid, before 1954 and before the euphoria started.

The second issue was Prof Lamont's belief that Pratt considered himself to be chosen by God to save South Africa and that this pointed to his being insane. Let us accept for the sake of argument that Pratt really believed he was "chosen." Wasn't this exactly the same thing Dr. Verwoerd believed of himself? As we have seen, Dr. Verwoerd, and even many of his followers, interpreted his survival as proof that he was chosen by God to fulfil his mission in South Africa. However, no-one ever questioned the sanity of Dr. Verwoerd or his followers, although their claims were exactly the same as Pratt's. Did Prof. Lamont believe that Dr. Verwoerd and his followers were perfectly sane in believing Dr. Verwoerd was called by God, but Pratt was insane for believing the same thing about himself?

Furthermore, it may be added that the evidence that Pratt believed himself to be chosen by God seems insubstantial – a reported remark at a medical conference which may have been intended to support his insanity plea. Elizabeth Radsma and Desmond Blow told the author that Pratt never said anything like this to them nor behaved in such a way and they found it "hard to believe" that their friend really believed such a proposition.⁷⁵⁶⁰

SAVIOUR/MARTYR ROLE

Like Prof. Hurst, Professor Lamont stated that Pratt saw himself in the saviour/martyr role. The diagnosis has been discussed earlier in this chapter in Prof. Hurst's testimony, so it will not be discussed here again as the same arguments apply, but its inaccuracy should be remembered and mentioned again.

THE ASSAULT

Pratt told Prof. Lamont that the shooting resulted in an utter release of tension followed by a sense of complete tranquillity. It marked the culmination of six years of depression and a guilt complex from which he suffered due to "failing to speak up for freedom, regardless of the consequences." Prof. Lamont said Pratt showed no remorse whatsoever about the assault and told him with “fanatical conviction” that it would have been an even greater crime had he not obeyed “the strong inner feeling to act for freedom.”⁷⁵⁶¹

⁷⁵⁶⁰ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

COMMENTS ON PROF. LAMONT'S ABOVE TESTIMONY

Pratt's comment about his “strong inner feeling to act for freedom” is highly important. It shows that he believed he did the right thing in shooting Dr. Verwoerd and that it was for freedom in South Africa, thus clearly his motive was political. It is generally accepted that people who see something evil happening and fail to act are as guilty as the perpetrators of the act. This explains Pratt's relief at no longer being such a person and his lack of remorse.

PRATT'S SPEECH IN THE COURT

Although Pratt defied his counsel's advice and spoke about freedom in South Africa and the need to end apartheid, Prof. Lamont said Pratt told him afterwards that he regretted not saying more on the subject. This is an important issue, pointing clearly to Pratt's political motivation. Desmond Blow told the author the same thing, that Pratt was unhappy at the hospital and that he had deeply regretted going along with the insanity plea; he felt that he had not defended his act as he wanted in political terms, especially during his speech in court. He told Blow that he had only taken this path for his daughter's sake after tremendous pressure from her. However, he regretted doing so when his act was misrepresented. He felt then that he had achieved nothing and had lost a significant opportunity to make a statement against apartheid. The unpleasant hospital environment only added to his unhappiness.⁷⁵⁶²

PROF. LAMONT'S CONCLUSION

Prof. Lamont conclusion was that, “In my opinion, the findings clearly show him as mentally disordered and an epileptic,” within the meaning of the Mental Disorders Act. He added that Pratt's indifference to his predicament, his compelling preoccupation with exercise and his behaviour throughout were consistent with the behaviour of a person suffering from epilepsy, ⁷⁵⁶¹ Prof. Lamont's report about David Pratt: Accused reaction to information gleaned from documents, friends, relatives and employees in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Daily Dispatch, 27 September 1960: 3, ‘No trial for Pratt’; The Cape Argus, 26 September 1960: 2, ‘Judge rules Pratt is mentally disordered.’

⁷⁵⁶² Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

and the undercurrent of grandiose delusions further supported this. His tendency to minimise his trouble was an indication that he was completely out of touch with reality.⁷⁵⁶³

JUDGE RUMPF'S VERDICT⁷⁵⁶⁴

Justice Rumpff accepted Prof. Lamont's diagnosis that Pratt was mentally disordered in terms of the Mental Disorders Act and that he was an epileptic in terms of that Act. He found Pratt to be mentally disordered and committed him to the Pretoria prison to "await an indication" of Governor-General⁷⁵⁶⁵ Charles R. Swart's pleasure. He stressed that the court was concerned only with Pratt's mental condition now. "At this stage, no decision on the responsibility or mental state of the accused at the time of the commission of the crime can be made." He then read from the Mental Disorders Act: "Epilepsy is a disease of the mind. A person found to be suffering from epilepsy should not be tried, but regarded as mentally disordered." He then said, "It is not for me to disagree with the legislature."

However, there would be no question of abandoning the charge against Pratt, he pointed out, as Amendments in 1944 to the Criminal Procedure Act provided that the charge would not be deemed abandoned or withdrawn because mental disorders might prove to be temporary. It was in the interests of justice, the judge said, that Pratt be tried when – and if – his mental fitness was restored.

⁷⁵⁶³ Prof. Lamont's report about David Pratt: Accused reaction to information gleaned from documents, friends, relatives and employees in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Daily Dispatch, 27 September 1960: 3, 'No trial for Pratt'; The Cape Argus, 26 September 1960: 2, 'Judge rules Pratt is mentally disordered.'

⁷⁵⁶⁴ Judge Rumpff's Judgement in Regina vs David Beresford Pratt, 26 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

⁷⁵⁶⁵ A Governor General's patient is confined in a mental hospital from which he may be released if he has shown no symptoms of mental illness in the last four years of his confinement. It may be recommended to the Governor General that he be granted a conditional or unconditional release. Under a conditional release, the magistrate of the district in which he lives, instructs a district surgeon to examine the patient every quarter and makes a report (The Cape Argus, 26 September 1960: 1, 'Pratt will not stand trial: mentally disordered').⁷⁵⁶⁵

PRATT IN HOSPITAL

The Governor-General decided that Pratt should be kept indefinitely at the Old Fort, a mental facility for violent and criminally insane patients, which was part of the Oranje Mental Hospital in Bloemfontein. The elation that Pratt experienced with the removal of his guilt feelings remained with him, at least at the beginning of his time in the facility, and he declared that this was the happiest time of his life since 1954.

In an essay he wrote shortly after the national referendum of October 5, 1960, which made South Africa a Republic, Pratt declared, "Whatever may be the outcome of all this, I know that I have solved my guilt complex. And the last two months, with all their restrictions and isolations, etc., have been the finest and happiest I've spent since 1954." He added, "In conclusion, I believe that every thinking South African suffers from a degree of guilt. My action may be scandalous or un-South African, but South African-ism, as far as I can see, has up until now consisted of useless moaning and apathetic acceptance, or else plans to pack up and leave the country. Naturally, there are exceptions, most of whom are now in jail under the emergency regulations, or else outside the country. What happens to me is completely immaterial in relation to any help I can be to South Africa."⁷⁵⁶⁶

While at the hospital, Pratt was allowed to play bowls on Wednesday afternoons, but the best time of the day for him was between 5 p.m. when he was locked in his barred room, and 9 p.m., when the lights went out. "Then it is quiet and I can read and think," he said. Pratt spent some time playing chess with a German patient who once played the game at a high level in Berlin. Pratt was also active in improving not only his personal space but the wider surroundings. When he arrived at the Fort, there were only two lavatories for twenty-six patients, and he arranged for two additional lavatories to be built.⁷⁵⁶⁷

He also wrote fairy tales for his children back in Holland.⁷⁵⁶⁸ In a letter to Sue Charter on December 12, 1960, Pratt wrote, "I smuggled this pad into my cell tonight, having obtained it to write Georgina a fairy story for her birthday, otherwise all writing is restricted to Saturday afternoons at a communal table, in a windy yard, to the accompaniment of Springbok Radio. After this, I experienced a week of euphoria, during which I must have been a most irritating patient. I need not give any detail, but I spent 24 hours locked in my ⁷⁵⁶⁶ David Pratt's essay while in prison in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁶⁷ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 1, 3, 'Pratt: Try me for attempted murder. But Judge President rejects his plea.'

⁷⁵⁶⁸ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, 'Pratt wrote fairy tales in hospital.'

cell, without even the comfort of a Bible. However, I was perfectly happy, and I don't think the doctors or staff knew what to do, anyway.

After this, however, they increased my largactil to 150 grams a day, and I am getting a horrible skin irritation, but refuse to reduce. I refuse to take it. And they then inject into muscular by force. The drug drains all vitality from my body and prevents concentration. In order to write this letter tonight, I evaded taking the tablets at 4pm. This however is not easy, for they are constantly watching.”⁷⁵⁶⁹

Pratt received regular visitors, including family, friends and associates. They said Pratt was always courteous and liked offering them tea.⁷⁵⁷⁰ One of them was Doreen Billson, who said that Pratt was dreaming of the day he would be released, whereupon he planned to sail around the world.⁷⁵⁷¹

In March 1961, Pratt wrote to the National Liberal Club in London thanking them “for looking after his personal possessions.” The Club decided that his supernumerary membership should be retained by asking Mrs. Pratt, expected in London at the end of March, to pay the balance of one guinea due on the new rate of subscription. According to Mr. Michael Meadowcroft, a prominent member of the NLC and a former Liberal MP, the Club had taken a supportive view of Pratt's situation, and his membership had become supernumerary “because of his incarceration, which meant that he was not in a position to use the Club facilities.”⁷⁵⁷²

While at the hospital, Pratt received large numbers of supportive letters. They were rationed out to him at the rate of a small bundle a week. All the letters were marked with a purple censor's stamp and some had sections cut out with scissors, removing any political reference that could be construed in his favour. In one of these letters, Mrs. Rita Malan, wrote, “You are not alone. More than half our country agrees with you. If they hang you, they will be hanging all of us.”⁷⁵⁷³

However, life for Pratt was not always easy. Dr. Jacobson, his former psychiatrist, who visited him regularly, said Pratt was a cultured and intellectual person who found life at ⁷⁵⁶⁹ David Pratt letter to Nico Charter in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁷⁰ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 1, 'Pratt: Try me for Attempted Murder. But Judge President rejects his plea.'

⁷⁵⁷¹ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷⁵⁷² Michael Meadowcroft in a personal interview, 2 February 2017.

⁷⁵⁷³ Gray, 1993: 12-13.

the hospital depressing. He asked the authorities to release Pratt, but they indicated that he had to spend at least a year in the institution before parole could be considered.⁷⁵⁷⁴

It was not long before Pratt's feelings of elation turned to unhappiness, largely due to a lack of companionship.⁷⁵⁷⁵ Fr. Orsmond, who visited him often, said, "Once they put him inside the mental hospitals, he became a very miserable man. He couldn't take it ... I was appalled to see the way he had disintegrated."⁷⁵⁷⁶ Pratt's wife Patricia visited him from Holland, but said she could not come more often due to the children's schooling. The Commissioner for Mental Health at this stage had not replied to Pratt's plea to be moved to an institution in the Transvaal.⁷⁵⁷⁷ Desmond Blow said that Pratt had lived all his life "like a playboy" and now he had to live in a hospital, following rules and a laid-down schedule. What made his situation worse was the guilt he felt about agreeing to the insanity plea and the disappointment that his act was misunderstood.⁷⁵⁷⁸

Furthermore, some patients and a larger number of hospital employees were supporters of Dr. Verwoerd and made life difficult for Pratt on a daily basis. What particularly angered them was that he was a wealthy White man and therefore in their eyes the worst kind of traitor.⁷⁵⁷⁹ Fr. Orsmond recalled, "He did say that there were people who were against him because he had shot Dr. Verwoerd. In other words, there was even a political element among the patients there, and, of course, among the staff, and to be expected at that time, yes. And so there would be people who would make it very difficult for him."⁷⁵⁸⁰ Pratt was involved in at least two physical fights. In one, with another patient, he suffered bruised ribs, while in the second, with two men, he received a black eye and his false teeth were broken.⁷⁵⁸¹

In a letter to Sue Charter, Pratt referred to his mistreatment by a patient named Diesel, who was apparently angered by Pratt's generosity. He wrote, "My information is that Diesel has been instructed to make life difficult for me. He apparently feels a conflict with me over who is to run this place among the patients. He is the ideal type to run a concentration camp."

⁷⁵⁷⁴ Bird 1992: 208.

⁷⁵⁷⁵ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 1, 'Pratt: Try me for Attempted Murder. But Judge President rejects his plea'; The Guardian, 3 October 1961: 21, 'Assailant of Dr. Verwoerd dead.'

⁷⁵⁷⁶ Fr. Reginald Orsmond in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁷⁷ Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁷⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁵⁷⁹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Father Reginald Orsmond and Guy Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁸⁰ Fr. Reginald Orsmond in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁸¹ Blow (Sunday Times), 22 January 1960: 1, 'Depression caused Pratt's escape bid.'

Pratt concluded, “This letter is not meant to be a moan, but simply a record of what is happening in South Africa through our own apathy.”⁷⁵⁸² Nevertheless, Pratt helped those around him, giving money or buying Coca-Cola, cakes and biscuits for poor patients.⁷⁵⁸³

In a letter to his sister, Pratt listed his hospital routine:

6 a.m. Dress and clean up cell.

7 a.m. Wash.

7.30 a.m. Daily chores.

8.00 a.m. Thomas à Kempis and meditation.

9.00 a.m. Exercise.

9.30 a.m. Read Knox.

10.30 a.m. Letters.

11.30 a.m. Chess.

12.00 noon Lunch and exercise.

1.30 p.m. Read light literature.

2.30 p.m. Chess

3.30 p.m. Read Therese.

5.00 p.m. Thomas à Kempis and thought.

6.00 p.m. Missal.

7.00 p.m. Read Knox.

8.00 p.m. Chess.⁷⁵⁸⁴

Sue Charter, who visited him in the hospital regularly, told Guy Spiller:

“Although that was what the trial had described David as – the criminally insane – and, you know, put him into that position, it (the hospital) was full of people who were very, very different from him. He was still, to all intents and purposes, very much the way he was ⁷⁵⁸² David Pratt letter to Sue Charter in Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁸³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁸⁴ Gray, 1993: 12.

outside. I mean, he appeared very sane and very relaxed, although he did speak of being very depressed, obviously, at times. He was seriously out of place there. The extraordinary thing was that in most ways, of course, the structure there couldn't adapt to somebody like David. He had come from an enormously privileged environment, and he wasn't in any way standardly insane... whereas a number of people there were clearly, yes, criminally insane, and therefore very different.

But the institution, sort of, was, like, monosyllabic and unchanged. And yet, in some way, he always appeared to touch it slightly. You know, that rules would be broken, and apparently he got permission to buy everybody Cokes and biscuits for Saturdays. And, you know, there would be some prisoners who would... who sort of took this largesse, well, happily, and regarded Pratt as a kind of rather heroic figure in their midst. And others who are... like Mr Diesel, who became a friend of my mother, who used to say no, he's not going to take Mr. Pratt's Coca-Cola, and he's not going to take his biscuits."⁷⁵⁸⁵

One of Pratt's more regular visitors was Desmond Blow of the Sunday Times, who, during his trial, had become a good friend. From time to time, Blow would write an article about Pratt, but he would always write what he knew the authorities wanted to hear and not what his friend had actually told him. Blow told the author that Pratt was always eager to find out about the current political situation in South Africa and continually asked about it. Blow said that Pratt was "genuinely concerned about the social injustice that was taking place in South Africa." Pratt felt "guilty because he felt privileged" as a wealthy White man, which was why he acted generously towards his non-White workers. Pratt spoke at length about his life and his political ideas and Blow was deeply impressed by his "immense compassion" for his fellow people, especially the oppressed and the poor. Although Pratt was anti-Communist, he repeatedly told Blow that he would have much preferred a Communist regime in South Africa under the ANC or the South African Communist Party than apartheid, even if it cost him his fortune. The more Blow got to know Pratt, the more he admired him.⁷⁵⁸⁶

⁷⁵⁸⁵ Sue Charter in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁵⁸⁶ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

PRATT'S PREPARATIONS TO APPEAL TO HAVE HIS CASE RE-OPENED

As time passed, Pratt's regret over his insanity plea deepened, particularly because his assault on Dr. Verwoerd was portrayed as the act of a madman. He felt that his deed and the motive for it were undermined by the insanity plea and that it had all been for nothing. Even worse, Pratt felt guilty that he had used what he now considered to be an "act of cowardice" as opposed to how a gentleman would have acted. Deeply upset, he determined to defend his act and to "put the record straight," as he told Desmond Blow. In a clearly regretful mood, he wrote in his notes, "My daughter engaged very eminent Counsel for me who represented me at the preliminary hearing. When you engage Counsel you must take his advice, and the advice I received was to fight this on a mental basis and be committed to an institution."⁷⁵⁸⁷ The latter possibility, the prospect of being hospitalised indefinitely, was something Pratt was finding ever more difficult to cope with.

Pratt decided therefore to ask the authorities to re-open his case in an attempt to set the record straight regarding not only his action but also his character. His family and the lawyers tried to dissuade him, arguing that this would make things worse for him and would harm his chances of getting parole soon. However, Pratt was adamant, and began working on his own defence, ready to accept criminal and political responsibility for his action, a process upon which his lawyers declined to co-operate.⁷⁵⁸⁸

One of those who tried to dissuade him was his new good friend, Desmond Blow, who knew that he could then very well be sentenced to death. Pratt had admitted to Blow that he believed he was still alive because he was considered to be insane and that he would probably have been murdered if the authorities thought otherwise. Nevertheless, he was still determined to change his plea. Blow told the author that Pratt was fully aware of what the outcome of a new trial might be, but he was confident that he would avoid a death sentence.⁷⁵⁸⁹

His intention was to turn his trial into a trial of apartheid, where the focus would be the evils of the race policy and not his deed. For this reason, he decided to ask prominent friends who opposed apartheid to testify. Even if he was sentenced to death, he said, he was ready to die for his principles. Most important for him was to tell the truth about his act, his ⁷⁵⁸⁷ David Pratt's 'Method for approaching trial.' n.d. Personal Collection of Desmond Blow.

⁷⁵⁸⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

⁷⁵⁸⁹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

political views and his character. He believed that by doing this, he would redeem himself for what he saw as his cowardly stance at the previous trial and thus rid himself of an immense burden of guilt. At the same time, he wanted people to know that he was not insane, but politically motivated. He also told Blow something along the lines of his letter to Dr. Verwoerd, "that it is better for a man to die for a principle than to live in contradiction thereto."⁷⁵⁹⁰

Thus, Pratt began studying law books and listing witnesses to testify in a possible forthcoming trial. Blow assisted him by contacting potential witnesses and providing law books and anything else he wanted. Pratt worked endlessly on his trial preparations but was careful to conceal the scale of his intentions, such as calling new witnesses and attacking apartheid. His cell now was full of papers and scribbled notes, many bearing cryptic words to mislead the authorities if they investigated. He avoided any mention of the real names of the witnesses he planned to call. He referred to Harry Oppenheimer as "Uncle David" and to Sir Paul Dukes as "Peter the gardener." In case of a sudden cell inspection, Pratt repeated the sugar trick that he had used in prison to warn him of an approaching guard. By the time any official appeared, Pratt would have cleared his papers away and would be idly reading a thriller or his Bible.⁷⁵⁹¹

The code words and the sugar ruse showed a man capable not only of managing his own affairs but able to think intelligently and to plan in detail. Pratt's ability to evade warders and people of authority in a situation of confinement which he had never experienced reflect a characteristic that would be a highly unusual, if not impossible, in a person thought to be mentally unstable.

The following document from Desmond Blow's personal collection is a detailed, twenty-four-page plan written by Pratt while in the hospital, which sets out how he aims to have his case re-opened. Blow was assisting Pratt in his preparations and the document was given to him by his friend for his opinion.⁷⁵⁹² Pratt sets out what he will tell the court, names the witnesses he will call and gives some personal details about his life. His intentions are set out lucidly and at some length; they are perfectly logical and quite evidently the work of an intelligent, stable and clear-thinking person.

⁷⁵⁹⁰ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

⁷⁵⁹¹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015

⁷⁵⁹² Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

Page 1METHOD FOR APPROACHING TRIAL.

Object will be to show that any person can be pushed to a point where firing at another is not regarded as murder. The classic example, of course, being rape. Naturally the degree of pressure required to reach this state will vary not only with different people but with the same person according to his mental health and outlook on life at various times as affected by exterior circumstances.

We then call witnesses to show the national outlook created by the policy of Verwoerd. I suggest Rupert and Harry Oppenheimer. We then became more personal and call Zulman who can give evidence of his own reactions to the police vans filled with detainees that lie passed in my company on Thursday, and his decision not to proceed with my plan to amalgamate our sweet factories owing to the economic position created by Verwoerd.

We then become completely personal. Friedman can be called to testify our breach of relations on the Friday. The medical team can be lined up to show the relative ease in which a person suffering from a disability such as mine can be pushed into the position when an act such as mine is beyond human control such as discovering his child being attacked. Hurst can give his opinion of Saturday night.

Page 2

John can testify that I was in a transition stage of reorientation to a life without the aid of regular epileptic attacks. Epilepsy is a way of life to which I had become accustomed over the last forty years. After the periods of Euphoria in 1954 my cycle was broken and I descended into a period of acute depression during which I dispersed beautiful Ayrshire herd, suffered acute urticaria and finally caused the breakup of my family as my wife feared my depression might lead to violence. It is necessary to learn the process of readjustment from infancy which we commenced to Loudon and discontinued for a month's break to attend affairs to S. Africa. Though benefit was already being felt complete adjustment to present circumstances would take some years.

I can be the final witness and describe my steadily increasing sense of personal guilt since 1954 over the chaos in S. Africa. My reaction towards my personal affairs with increasing inability to concentrate on day to day work, vacant periods in my mind coupled with anti-social behaviour, naturally I do not know other people's minds so I cannot say how much of this is normal to mankind and how much is mental sickness. It must be a matter of degree. All I know is that periodically the necessity to take some action to release this unbearable weight, that used to be relieved by an epileptic seizure regularly once a month and more often if necessary, becomes essential.

Page 3

One such occasion was when my wife and children were hiding in Holland and I was prohibited entry into the country because I had tried to go in with a revolver. I obtained a duplicate passport from S. Africa House, hired a car and drove in via Ostend. The result was an attempt by the Dutch police to throw me out and I then insisted upon taking my young son with me. As a result I had to fight an urgent application to Court in Holland in which I told them I had merely come to see my children and would only take the baby away if I was thrown out. I won the case and received permission to stay. However, on every occasion I enter Holland now I am virtually stripped and searched for firearms. To my mind the whole business appears fantastic.

Another occasion concerned the management of my sweet factors by my cousin Stuart Pratt. I was very dissatisfied with the policy he was pursuing and in addition had reason to suspect his honesty. After some difficult sessions at the factory I arranged a meeting at my office in Surrey House where we would be quite private and staff could not overhear. He didn't turn up so I drove to the factory and found him reading a newspaper.

I then pulled him out of his chair and had a fight. I feel the shooting of Verwoerd falls into the same category.

Page 4

Due to the automatic release of nervous tensions by seizures I have never learnt any other way of getting rid of them. Now that seizures have diminished I have got to, or I can't go on living. In fact if it is going to get worse I do not intend to go on living, but I shall battle my best to see it gets better. Since a very young child these forces within me have been kept suppressed with steadily increasing doses of drugs which I feel are detrimental to memory and work; then with almost clockwork regularity they would be dispersed by a seizure. Now the drugs continue but the seizures have been largely replaced by urges of varying strength, the performance of which releases the internal tensions as effectively as the seizure, I feel that with the right help they can be controlled and directed into the right channels of work when they might be of some use to the community; but I feel more and more certain that this channel is not a business life. The machinations of my staff to enmesh me again in the running of my sweet factory which had to come to a head on the Monday, April 11th, represented a pit to be avoided at all costs. I had given them a new sales staff, new sales control; they had got new vigour and enthusiasm, but they were still not satisfied. They wanted me to fire the new manager, van Niekerk, and give them my whole time and energy.

Page 5

This would have represented a living death but I could not explain that to them for they saw it as a path of roses. This prospect also had a hand in framing my action on the Saturday, but not consciously so at the time.

The help I received in London from Dr. John, and help from Father Macginnis, an R.C. priest, during my confinement awaiting trial have convinced me that certain lines of thought, plus patience, will produce results and my faith is stronger now than ever before.

Therefore I feel the common-sense action for the Court is:

- (a) Extradite me and I will continue treatment and find new work abroad;
- (b) Commit me to an institution where I can receive similar treatment and review the matter later;
- (c) Hang me and be done with it.

There is no personal fear connected with a long term of imprisonment, but I am afraid of the possible effects on other people if I serve it untreated. Irrespective of the quantity of drugs given to me, the environment will be bound to accentuate the forces of resistance, and the results may affect others.

[Pages 6 and 7 are missing]

Page 8

My lord, Gentleman of the Jury, I am fighting this myself because it is not a case for which there is any precedent in S. Africa and because it's one that involves human emotions rather than law. My daughter engaged very eminent Counsel for me who represented me at the preliminary hearing. When you engage Counsel you must take his advice, and the advice I received was to fight this on a mental basis and be committed to an institution. If the motives behind my action warrant that fate, then I feel humanity has had its chips and the sooner an atomic explosion get rid of us the better.

You have heard an account of my difficulties in 1954. What you have not heard is that had we been living before the age of professional psychiatry and there had been no practitioners to advise me, I would unquestionably have followed the inner call I discussed with Dr. Geerling, and say whole life could have been different from that time. I venture to suggest that had Joan of Arc called upon a psychiatrist, the history of France might have been very different and she would have been saved from the stake. I mention her not from any desire to suggest a correlation between my humble urges and her great ones, but simply because Dr. Geerling mentioned her as an accepted medical example of a disturbance of the frontal lobe when we were discussing the music that was constantly playing in my mind during the second euphoric phase ...

Page 9⁷⁵⁹³

You've also heard from Mr. Harry Oppenheimer an account of my interview with him when I tried to form a coalition government under Mr Havanga in my third and last phase of euphoria. But when, after a long argument in a private room in the House of Assembly, I allowed myself to be convinced that the scheme could not be carried out, I resigned myself to the future under Mr Strijdom, with Dr. Verwoerd as Minister of Native Affairs. Within 48 hours, I sank into a depression which has paralysed my activity and ruined my family life for six solid years."⁷⁵⁹⁴

Page 10

⁷⁵⁹³ Page 9 is missing from Desmond Blow's personal collection, but it can be heard at Noel Spiller's The Liberate and the Pirate.

⁷⁵⁹⁴ Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

In 1955 I started to disagree strongly with my farm manager, van Wolften Polthe, whom I had brought out from Holland. He had been my best man at my wedding and his wife was my wife's closest friend. The 'Byeways' Ayrshire herd had been my dearest possession and was known throughout the country. I lost interest in it and dispersed it in 1956 by public auction, simultaneously sacking Polthe, leasing my dairy, and moving into ray new house I had built on Moloney's Hill. From here I tried to concentrate on my trout hatchery and my other business interests in the country. However, whatever was inside me would not leave me in peace. I could see the political path we were treading all too clearly, and felt an ever growing sense of personal guilt through my cowardice in not continuing with what I felt meant to do in 1954.

Consequently I developed a severe urticaria on my legs and ankles and had to enter a nursing home for treatment, as you have heard from Dr. Leigh. During this period I corresponded with Sir Paul Dukes who was then living in S. Africa and had given a series of Toga lectures at the Langham Hotel. I joined his school and derived considerable benefit from the instruction, but it was only another hand helping to ease the heavy weight inside me which nothing would disperse.

Page 11

I felt a trip outside the Union might help so I booked on the 'Ruys' for a six week cruise to S. America, within 24 hours of leaving Cape Tom, my urticaria was gone, my heart felt light, and I thoroughly enjoyed the voyage. The urticaria did not return but the weight did on return to the Union, and my wife suggested we should consider living in Europe or England as in any event education would be difficult for the children, who were now two, from Kagaliesburg.

Therefore we went over in October 56, and looked around Switzerland, Austria and England. I obtained a number of houses from Harrods and other agents and we toured England looking at them. But my heart was not in the job for I loved my home, S. Africa, and all my interests were here. By this time, as you must well imagine, my personal family life was deteriorating. I was moody, anti-social and disinterested in life. I refused to move to Europe but compromised on the Cape, and returned alone, leaving the family in Holland. Though I lived alone on the farm, I threw myself much more deeply into Yoga and Paul Dukes became a frequent visitor to my home. The benefit of this practice sustained me during these months and I purchased 'Old Sellery' in Constantin to move the family into when they returned.

Page 12

My wife's letters were friendly and stimulating and I could see that she was becoming steadily more spiritual, he was urging me to arrive back in Holland in time for a pilgrimage she wished me to make with her to Lourdes, in company with two friends. She had also booked seats for the famous Rotterdam Horse Show and the music festival in Schevening. She wanted me to bring some smoked trout from the farm as a present to Prince Bernhard, and generally quite a session was laid on for my arrival. However it was not a success though we did all the things that were laid on, and she was advised by her friends to be careful as they thought I was going mad and might become dangerous.

Eventually I flew back alone, leaving her and the children to follow by boat in December. On my return in October 57, Paul Dukes had left the country and I had a complete nervous breakdown spending some time recuperating in Sanatoria. In December I received a cable saying she was not returning, followed by a brief letter saying that on medical advice she was staying away a little longer. You can imagine my predicament. Everything was now destroyed. My farm was to be occupied by friends who had moved up to Johannesburg from 'Old Sellery', which was now standing empty awaiting my arrival. My strong pillar Paul Dukes had left the country, and now my wife and children refused to come back.

Page 13

Behind all this the Daily Press was full of the Senate Act and the deprivation of Coloured votes the fault for which I felt was solely mine.

I am not going to take you through the next two years in detail. They are too horrible to recall. Briefly, I first of all ran away to restart life under a new name somewhere quite unknown. However, I returned, for my interests were too wide and too many people were dependent upon me. Then I went over to Holland to find out 'what was what' in the words of Dr. Geerling.

I took with me a revolver chiefly because I was growing as accustomed to carrying one as to carrying a tooth brush, however, I must admit that suicidal thoughts were also in my mind should I be unable to arrange my domestic life, and depression became unbearable. However, I was most rigidly searched by the Dutch customs police, the revolver found, and I was then refused admission to the country and sent over to London. I then obtained a duplicate passport, hired a car and drove in via Ostend, arriving unexpectedly at the house in Den Haag, where the family were living. Police were waiting for me next morning and I had to fight a court case that night to obtain permission to remain in Holland. This I won, but an atmosphere was left which could be cut with a knife.

[Page 14 is missing]

Page 15

I continued with my work to the best of my very limited ability on my return, and arranged open east Manganese mining on my farm by the Orient Manganese Co.

Early last year I felt I must see the absent family again, so I took a boat across to try and relax at sea. A fellow passenger discussed with me a psycho-analyst who had been of great help to the family, and I took the name and address. Again the visits to Holland were not a success, and I could see we were now growing apart and I must reconcile myself to divorce.

Back in London I called on the psycho-analyst, Dr. John, who offered me daily treatment and reckoned if that could not cure me nothing would, but I must be prepared to give him a couple of years. I lived at my Club and busied myself with electioneering, plus a bit of journalism. I had to defend S. Africa from a variety of attacks, particularly when speaking in Hyde Park.

There was definite benefit from Dr. John's treatment, and when I met my solicitor in London - who was over from Johannesburg for a week - he reckoned he had never seen me so well. Correspondence from S. Africa, however, showed increasing difficulties, particularly with the Manganese operations, and I was compelled to buy a half-interest in a Ramsgate Hotel to protect the other half, the shares of which were bonded to me. Therefore I could see a temporary return was going to be compulsory. In February I returned by Union Castle, as I had my car.

[Pages 16-20 are missing]

Page 21

Zulman will say:

He was negotiating with me for purchase of share in Crispettes. After discussions in Durban he came up on the Thursday and visited the factory with Lampert. We then lunched in Hillbrow.

In the afternoon we drove to town and passed the vans filled with detainees. He will describe the effect they had upon him.

He will then give his views on the position of the country under Verwoerd and his decision not to expand further until he can see a light through the darkness. Consequently negotiations stopped.

Page 22

Oppenheimer will say:

I rang him in 1954 for an interview and proposed certain things to form a coalition government. He agreed to co-operate and I left him to see the others.

He, too, will give his account of the position of the country under Verwoerd and his views on expansion under the circumstances.

Phone him to see if he is agreeable.

Jacobson will say:

He has been treating me for epilepsy since I left Chesler. He will describe the epileptic personality and how it is possible for epileptics to imagine uncontrollable urges and phantasies. The growing conviction of a most strange phantasy received unexpected collaboration from a witness at the hearing. I have not discussed it yet and will not do so until I am sure. Then I will finish my address to the Jury.

[Page 23 is missing]

Page 24

Thousands have tried running way but this is no good. If S. Africa is their country they will carry their guilt with them wherever they may go.

The result of the referendum on Oct. 5th is relatively unimportant against the fact that it is being held at all. This further generation of emotion in these critical days resemble a patient with increasing attacks of blood pressure, because he is unable to relax. Despite Mr. De Kock's announcement that we must exert ourselves to regain the confidence of foreign, investors, we don't seem to be doing an awful lot about it. In fact we, the finest and most developed state on this continent which should not merely be providing the example of statesmanship and true multi-racial government but become the centre of an African Commonwealth of nations with a glorious future as we helped to develop this great continent, instead turn in upon ourselves and create an isolated laager with discipline precariously maintained with ever bigger sticks.

Page 24a

You have listened to a very complete account of how this was done hut no word of why it was done.

COMMENTS ON PRATT'S PLANNING

As one can see, there is nothing in Pratt's scheme to suggest he was insane. The plan for a new trial is clearly set out, potential witnesses are named along with outlines of what each of them will be asked. Pratt also works on his speech. It is impossible to suggest this was anything but the work of an entirely sane and clear-minded person.

Pratt's comments about the historic figure of Joan of Arc were relevant to his case. The music he heard in his euphoric state was caused by his medication; it is impossible to know the cause of the voices and visions of Joan of Arc. However, Pratt is surely right in saying that the French saint would not have escaped the attentions of a psychiatrist had she been examined in 1960.

As in his court appearance, Pratt sets out a clear and logical political statement about the country he loves and his wish to end apartheid, "In fact we, the finest and most developed state on this continent which should not merely be providing the example of statesmanship and true multi-racial government but become the centre of an African Commonwealth of nations with a glorious future as we helped to develop this great continent, instead turn in upon ourselves and create an isolated laager with discipline precariously maintained with ever bigger sticks.”

ONGOING PREPARATIONS FOR THE APPEAL

As requested by Pratt, Desmond Blow contacted Oppenheimer, Rupert and others. All agreed to testify and Oppenheimer offered to help in any other way he could. Also contacted by Blow at Pratt’s request was Sir Paul Dukes, former MI6 agent and Pratt’s “strong pillar” and yoga instructor who had become his close friend. He was the most difficult to track down of all of Pratt’s witnesses, but he agreed enthusiastically to testify and, like Oppenheimer, volunteered to help in any other way. Pratt was delighted by Dukes’ response and they began corresponding again. Two prominent political figure who volunteered to testify for Pratt was the British Liberal MP, Jeremy Thorpe and David Ennals, Chairman of the British anti-apartheid movement. They both volunteered to appear without being asked after Blow had inquired among Pratt’s friends in the Party as to who might be willing to testify. Other British Liberals, such as Bruce Hewes, were approached by Blow and all agreed to testify.⁷⁵⁹⁵

Pratt was excited by the positive responses he was getting and became convinced that by using the testimony of such notable anti-apartheid personalities, he could turn the trial into an indictment of apartheid. Blow said he had never seen Pratt happier during his time in hospital, not only because of the way his plans were shaping but because he was occupied doing something of great importance to himself.⁷⁵⁹⁶

The apartheid authorities were always worried about Blow’s relationship with Pratt, fearing what he might publish about his friend or that he might be assisting him somehow. While the two were preparing for the re-opening of the case, the police tapped Blow’s telephone and raided his house.⁷⁵⁹⁷ When they discovered evidence that Blow was helping Pratt with his re-trial plans and that witnesses including Dukes, Ennals, Oppenheimer and Thorpe had expressed willingness to testify, they made it more difficult for Blow to visit Pratt. Both men were placed under close observation, making it impossible for Pratt to hand over any new documents or even to talk comfortably, and the authorities rejected several ⁷⁵⁹⁵ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁵⁹⁶ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁵⁹⁷ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Graham David Blow in a personal interview, 8 October 2017.

requests by Blow to visit his friend. Because of these obstacles, Blow's visits to Pratt became much less frequent, to the disappointment of both.⁷⁵⁹⁸

PRATT'S APPEAL TO HAVE HIS CASE RE-OPENED

Despite this setback, on September 28, 1960, Pratt wrote to the Judge President, asking him to re-open his case and to try him for attempted murder. His letter read as follows:

The Supreme Court,
Pretoria.

Notice of Appeal – Regina v. Pratt

I herewith desire to give notice of appeal against the judgement of Mr Justice Rumpff in the above matter on Monday the 26th inst. on the following grounds:

1. No opportunity was given to me to answer the evidence of Dr Lamont or to cross-examine him.
2. I have reason to believe that there has been collaboration between ... (indecipherable word⁷⁵⁹⁹) which has prevented full facts being laid before the Bench prior to judgment.

It is for the above reasons, plus that of a judgment in terms of the Mental Disorders Act being one of fact rather than law that I am making this appeal in person. I consider it will be of assistance to your lordships in assessing the merits of this appeal.

Your obedient servant,

David B. Pratt.⁷⁶⁰⁰

⁷⁵⁹⁸ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁵⁹⁹ I think the word is "Council" - at least, comparing it with the rest of the writing on the page it seems to begin with "Co" and end in "il," and I can't think of anything else that fits. Possibly a misspelling of "counsel."

⁷⁶⁰⁰ David Pratt's letter to the Pretoria Supreme Court. 28 September 1960. Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

Although a crucial word in the letter is indecipherable, Pratt, according to Blow, believed that the psychiatrists who testified on behalf of the defence team had all been instructed by his lawyers to present him as they did in order to “get him off the hook.”⁷⁶⁰¹

On October 3, 1960, Pratt received a reply to his letter from D.J. Joubert, Registrar of the Supreme Court in Pretoria, saying that his appeal was not considered as valid, and that he should discuss the proposed appeal with his curator ad litem. He added that, “In regard to his statement that no opportunity was given to him to answer the evidence of Dr. Lamont or to cross-examine him, the record of the enquiry shows the following to have taken place after Dr. Lamont had given evidence:-

BY THE COURT: (To Counsel).

Have you any questions?

Mr. Maisels: No questions.

Mr. McEwan: No questions

Mr. Maisels addresses Court briefly.

Mr. Rein addresses the Court.⁷⁶⁰²

The Registrar was correct insofar as the question pertained to Pratt's defence team. However, Pratt was referring not to his lawyers but to himself as not having been given the chance to refute Dr. Lamont's evidence. Naturally, the defence team did not question Dr. Lamont's evidence because their stance was that Pratt was unfit to stand trial. As for Pratt, he was asked by his team and by his daughter not to make any further interruptions or statements.

Pratt was deeply disappointed by Joubert's response, but was determined to appeal again. However, after learning from his legal advisors that there was a good chance of his release on parole, he agreed to suspend his campaign at least temporarily, and to become a ⁷⁶⁰¹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁰² Letter from the D.J. Joubert, the Registrar of the Supreme Court in Pretoria to Pratt, 3 October 1960. Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

model patient/prisoner.⁷⁶⁰³ Pratt's next move was to write to the Commissioner for Mental Hygiene for permission to go to England for supposedly psycho-analytical treatment.⁷⁶⁰⁴ Although he did not say as much, Blow believed that Pratt was hoping that his friends in England would help him to escape.⁷⁶⁰⁵

LIFE AT THE HOSPITAL

In early January 1961, Blow visited Pratt as a "friend," but also interviewed him for the Sunday Times. It was his first visit in about three months and the first after his home had been raided by the security police. Blow reported that Pratt had lost weight since last September, but he looked well and appeared to be in high spirits and as alert as ever. Blow reported that Pratt's request to Justice Rumpff to have him tried again was turned down as was a request to the Commissioner for Mental Hygiene to go to England for psycho-analytical treatment.⁷⁶⁰⁶

In his article, Blow quoted Pratt as saying, "My pressing need is for companionship. Of the 26 men here, there are hardly any with similar personal interests... I accept being kept in the Fort as a new experience in life. Everything here is a challenge which must be accepted. If you weaken ..." he shrugged his shoulders. Then he added, "That is why it is necessary to keep my mind active."⁷⁶⁰⁷

Pratt's reaction to the rejection of his appeal demonstrates the depth of his misery in the mental hospital. He said, "I asked to be tried for the attempted murder of Dr. Verwoerd. If I were found guilty and given a sentence it would be far better than living here. I would know exactly how long I was to be in prison, but as a patient, I am here indefinitely. It is soul destroying. In prison, I can do some useful job, but here, there is nothing to do except fight the apathy that comes from complete idleness."⁷⁶⁰⁸

Blow told the author that Pratt was very lonely in the hospital and seriously disappointed that his attempt to secure a re-trial had failed, as had his hopes of getting to ⁷⁶⁰³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁰⁴ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 1, 3, 'Pratt: Try me for attempted murder. But Judge President rejects his plea.'

⁷⁶⁰⁵ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁰⁶ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 1, 3, 'Pratt: Try me for attempted murder. But Judge President rejects his plea.'

⁷⁶⁰⁷ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 3, 'Pratt: Try me for attempted murder. But Judge President rejects his plea.'

⁷⁶⁰⁸ Blow (Sunday Times), 8 January 1961: 3, 'Pratt: Try me for attempted murder. But Judge President rejects his plea.'

England. However, he had not given up on his hopes for parole, having been led to believe by his defence team that this was a real possibility, especially because of his genuine problem with epilepsy. Blow said that Pratt then had become quite pessimistic about a retrial, believing the authorities would never permit this because they wanted to preserve his image as an insane man. They knew that in any new trial he would appear as a sane, wealthy, competent, White South African businessman who opposed apartheid. Any such personification would be damaging to apartheid's image. Despite his lawyers' assurances, Pratt also had doubts whether he would be granted parole for the same reasons, that the authorities would not want him to be seen as sane and stable. Blow would remain a very good friend of Pratt throughout the latter's life. He continued to visit him and the two corresponded regularly until Pratt's death.⁷⁶⁰⁹

ANOTHER ESCAPE ATTEMPT

On January 19, 1961, Pratt was taken in a car with two attendants from the Old Fort, to a dental surgery in Bloemfontein. At about 11 a.m., the dentist gave Pratt an injection. While he was waiting for it to take effect, Pratt jumped from the chair and fled from the surgery on the first floor to the ground floor. Pursued by his two attendants, Pratt dashed into Maitland Street, Bloemfontein's busy main thoroughfare, and ran into a department store. His pursuers managed to corner him there. One held Pratt in a head-lock and they led him back to the surgery.⁷⁶¹⁰

Pratt's escape attempt was not a spur of the moment decision, but part of a well-planned scheme. Friends were waiting near the surgery to pick him up and transport him to an airfield where a plane was ready to fly him out of the country.⁷⁶¹¹ It was a similar scheme to that which was discovered by the police in May 1960, the one in which Maisels refused to co-operate.

Shortly after Pratt's bid for freedom, Desmond Blow visited him again. In an article for the Sunday Times, he attributed the escape attempt to depression. He wrote that Pratt was unhappy because:

⁷⁶⁰⁹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶¹⁰ Daily Dispatch, 20 January 1961: 1, 'David Pratt tries to escape'; Rand Daily Mail, 20 January 1961: 1, 'Pratt escapes from guards'; The Star, 20 January 1961: 5, 'Eye-witnesses laugh as Pratt runaway'; The Times, 20 January 1961: 9, 'Mr. Pratt tries to escape.'

⁷⁶¹¹ Guy Spiller in a personal interview, 8 April 2015.

- He lacked companionship.
- The authorities failed to try him again, as he requested.
- He was idle most of the day and had to spend much of his time in a yard thirty feet square.
- He lost interest in reading owing to the constant blare of the commercial radio, which most of the patients wanted.
- He was unable to study astronomy because he was locked in his room at 5 p.m. every day.
- His plea to be transferred from the Fort to a mental hospital in the Transvaal was rejected.
- He was involved in physical fights with other patients.
- His wife was unable to visit him that particular month.⁷⁶¹²

However, Blow told the author that this was only half the truth but he could not reveal everything in the newspaper in order to protect Pratt. Blow said that he exaggerated Pratt's situation in the hospital to mislead the authorities. He also told the author that Pratt attempted to escape simply because he wanted to be free and this had very little to do with depression. Blow felt that the authorities would probably be more lenient if it appeared that Pratt's motive was depression and not his desire for freedom. Blow said that Pratt had always kept the possibility of escape in mind. He also told the author that he never revealed Pratt's political ideas or their political conversations in his newspaper articles because he feared this would be harmful for Pratt. He thought Pratt would be safer if he was generally believed to be insane and apolitical.⁷⁶¹³

PRATT'S DEATH

After his latest escape attempt, life in the hospital got worse for Pratt. The authorities had him watched closely while making it more difficult for his friends to see him and for Pratt to correspond with them. During the last week of September 1961, Pratt was visited by his daughter Susan, who was due to be married at the end of the following month. Pratt wished her well and for a wedding present he gave her his dining room suite and his collection of ⁷⁶¹² Blow (Sunday Times), 22 January 1961: 1, 'Depression caused Pratt's escape bid.'

⁷⁶¹³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

valuable silver. She then flew to London to make preparations for the wedding.⁷⁶¹⁴ Pratt was deeply disappointed that he would not be able to attend the wedding.⁷⁶¹⁵

On Sunday, October 1, 1961, Pratt's 52nd birthday, John Spiller, his business associate, visited Pratt in the hospital, unaware that it was his birthday. He was Pratt's last visitor. Spiller found him in "top form," in a cheerful mood, with a very positive attitude and a good frame of mind, which he said was because it was his birthday. He was even cheeky with the guards. Spiller said about this visit, "I was in Bloemfontein on business at the time. It was only courtesy to go and call in on him and see him if I could, if they would let me see him, which they did. And I met David, and he said, 'Oh, I'm so glad to see you.' He said, 'It's actually my birthday today, and my sister has sent me a cake.' So he told the warders to go and get the cake, and we had tea. And he insisted that the warders bring me white sugar and not the brown government sugar."⁷⁶¹⁶ After Spiller's visit, Pratt spent a lot of time writing letters.⁷⁶¹⁷

Around 9 a.m. the next morning, a nurse entered Pratt's cell to switch off his light.⁷⁶¹⁸ He found him dead with a sheet around his neck. Pratt apparently had strangled himself by tying the ends of his bedsheet to the leg of his bedstead, putting his neck into the loop and twisting over and over until he was asphyxiated.⁷⁶¹⁹ A doctor gave him oxygen for forty-five minutes after he was found, but in vain.⁷⁶²⁰

The nurse who discovered the body found a note nearby.⁷⁶²¹ It said, "As I have received no reply from the Commissioner, I accept that the reply is in the negative. Under the circumstances, I think this is the best possible solution to my problem – for everybody. If possible, please arrange a quiet cremation for me in Johannesburg, and the ashes must be ⁷⁶¹⁴ Daily Express, 3 October 1961: 11, 'Man who shot Dr. Verwoerd is dead'; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 2, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

⁷⁶¹⁵ The Star, 2 October 1961: 1, 'Ms. Pratt is silent'; The Times, 3 October 1961: 8, 'Pratt found dead.'

⁷⁶¹⁶ John Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁶¹⁷ Rand Daily Mail, 3 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt died in agony: it's the best way out'; The Cape Times, 3 October 1961, 'Pratt's letter before cell suicide.'

⁷⁶¹⁸ Daily Express, 3 October 1961: 11, 'Man who shot Dr. Verwoerd is dead'; Rand Daily Mail, 3 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt died in agony: it's the best way out'; The Cape Times, 3 October 1961, 'Pratt's letter before cell suicide.'

⁷⁶¹⁹ Botha, 1967: 67.

⁷⁶²⁰ Slovo, 1995: 132; Rand Daily Mail, 3 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt died in agony: it's the best way out'; The Cape Times, 3 October 1961, 'Pratt's letter before cell suicide'; The Guardian, 3 October 1961: 21, 'Assailant of Dr. Verwoerd dead.'

⁷⁶²¹ The Guardian, 3 October 1961: 21, 'Assailant of Dr. Verwoerd dead.'

buried with those of my family at Maloney's Eye. Please avoid all publicity so that my children can simply be told that their father died in hospital."⁷⁶²²

AFTER PRATT'S DEATH

After his death, Pratt's body was removed to the police mortuary in Bloemfontein. The police announced that the body would be transported to Pretoria for a post-mortem examination and that a judicial enquiry would be made into the circumstances of his death.⁷⁶²³ However, no such enquiry ever took place, as far as the author can establish, or if it did, the outcome was never published. Pratt's body was given to his family on October 2, the day he was found dead, or October 3 at the latest, with the expectation that it would be cremated on Thursday, October 5. Delays in the arrival of mourners meant cremation actually took place on Friday, October 6.⁷⁶²⁴ As for an inquiry, the time between Pratt's death and the cremation surely did not allow for a serious forensic examination or the questioning of hospital staff and visitors or the organisation of a properly conducted inquest. Since no such investigation was ever officially mentioned, it is safe to conclude that none ever took place.

Hospital officials claimed that Pratt suffered from a severe epilepsy attack five days before his death and this had left him weak and depressed.⁷⁶²⁵ However, John Spiller, who visited him the day before he died, found him in a cheerful and positive mood. Spiller was stunned when he heard the next day that Pratt had committed suicide. He said, "I was going back to Johannesburg the very next day (after his visit with Pratt), and I put the radio on in my car, and I heard he had hung himself during the night, which was quite a surprise to me because he seemed to be in quite a good frame of mind whilst he was in the prison, especially that particular day."⁷⁶²⁶ Dr. Jacobson, Pratt's personal psychiatrist, who knew him well and visited him often in the hospital, was also taken aback at the report that Pratt had killed himself.⁷⁶²⁷

⁷⁶²² The Times, 3 October 1961: 8, 'Pratt found dead.'

⁷⁶²³ The Cape Times, 3 October 1961, 'Pratt's letter before cell suicide'; The Times, 3 October 1961: 8, 'Pratt found dead.'

⁷⁶²⁴ The Star, 3 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt funeral postponed.'

⁷⁶²⁵ Daily Express, 3 October 1961: 11, 'Man who shot Dr. Verwoerd is dead'; The New York Times, 3 October 1961, 'Dr. Verwoerd attacker takes own life in asylum'; The Star, 2 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt hangs himself on his birthday'

⁷⁶²⁶ John Spiller in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁶²⁷ Bird, 1992: 208.

After his death, the Cape Times, citing hospital and authority sources, reported that Pratt's stay in the Old Fort hospital was marked by "several unusual events." However, only one was mentioned - that just before Christmas, Pratt attended a party for the hospital's patients and "danced with several partners."⁷⁶²⁸ The newspaper did not explain what was so unusual about dancing with a variety of partners, unless such behaviour was considered strange in South Africa in 1960 and dancers were expected to have only one partner. The report seems more like a crude attempt to support the theory that Pratt was a "strange, unusual" man who committed suicide.

The Rand Daily Mail reported that an unnamed friend who visited Pratt was not surprised by his suicide. It quoted him as saying, "He was growing more depressed by the day. He realised there was a slight chance that he should ever leave the mental hospital."⁷⁶²⁹ This assumption was arguable, because, as Isie Maisels pointed out, a decision on parole for Pratt was due to be taken very soon.⁷⁶³⁰ Finally, Transition magazine wrote about Pratt shortly after his death that he had "made a sacrifice and a prophecy."⁷⁶³¹

One who was deeply affected by Pratt's death was Desmond Blow. He told the author that he was "devastated" when he heard the news and burst into tears. Indeed Blow wept quietly while talking to the author about Pratt, who he characterised as "a perfect gentleman" and one of the "kindest and bravest men" he ever met.⁷⁶³² Desmond's wife Elizabeth told the author that Pratt's death deeply upset her husband. "He was very upset and he just said he couldn't understand and yet, it really upset him and hurt him because he felt it was unnecessary... he really was, for a long time, he was upset about it. I don't think he fully recovered."⁷⁶³³

FUNERAL

Pratt's funeral was delayed to allow his daughter, Susan, and his second wife, Patricia, to arrive from England and Holland respectively.⁷⁶³⁴ The cremation was attended by family,

⁷⁶²⁸ The Cape Times, 3 October 1961, 'Pratt's letter before cell suicide.'

⁷⁶²⁹ Rand Daily Mail, 3 October 1961, 'Pratt's suicide did not surprise his friends.'

⁷⁶³⁰ Maisels, 1998: 107.

⁷⁶³¹ Transition, 1961: 272.

⁷⁶³² Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶³³ Elizabeth Blow in a personal interview, 26 October 2017.

⁷⁶³⁴ Daily Dispatch, 3 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt is found hanged-on 52nd birthday'; The Star, 3 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt funeral postponed.'

friends, and members of his Maloney's Eye work force on October 6, 1961 at Braamfontein Crematorium.⁷⁶³⁵ A private ceremony was held later when his ashes were scattered at Maloney's Eye, fulfilling his supposed last wish.⁷⁶³⁶

COMMENTS ON PRATT'S DEATH

Although there is no evidence to prove that Pratt did not commit suicide, the circumstances of his death remain shrouded in doubt, with questions ranging from penal precedent to behavioural improbabilities. Firstly, "suicide" or "natural causes" were the causes of death that were frequently announced when persons died in police detention or in prison during the apartheid years. It has been officially admitted that up until 1972, twenty-two persons died in detention. The cause of death in eleven cases was given as suicide, in three as natural causes and in one thrombosis.⁷⁶³⁷

Probably the two best-known cases are those of Ahmed Timol in 1971, whose death was ruled by the magistrate at an inquest to be "suicide,"⁷⁶³⁸ and Steve Biko, whose death was initially declared to be from "natural causes."⁷⁶³⁹ Both cases have been discussed in Chapter Five. It is obvious that we should be sceptical when deaths of many political prisoners during apartheid were attributed to suicide or natural causes. Pratt's death is no exception. The following points concerning Pratt's behaviour and the opinions of people who knew him well must be considered in seeking to assess whether or not his death was suspicious:

- Pratt adored his daughter Susan and was upset that he would not be able to attend her wedding. By committing suicide less than a month before the planned event, he must have known how much this would hurt her and very likely cause a postponement of the wedding. It seems more than logical that if Pratt wanted to commit suicide, he would have waited another three weeks to be sure that it would not spoil his daughter's wedding.
- John Spiller, the last of Pratt's friends to see him alive, only a few hours before his death, said his business partner was in high spirits, joking and even cheeking the warders. When ⁷⁶³⁵ The Times, 3 October 1961: 8, 'Pratt found dead.'

⁷⁶³⁶ The Star, 7 October 1961: 1, 'Pratt's last wish.'

⁷⁶³⁷ Cook, 1974: 27.

⁷⁶³⁸ Houston and Magubane, 2007: 440-441; Magubane, 2007: 5; World Peace Council, 1972: 4-5.

⁷⁶³⁹ Baxter, 1985: 137-138; SAHO, n.d. 'The Inquest into Biko's death and his funeral.'

he heard of his death he was shocked because Pratt's demeanour did not remotely suggest he was contemplating suicide.

- Desmond Blow did not expect Pratt's death and "couldn't believe it" when he heard. He had visited Pratt just a couple of weeks earlier and got the impression that his mood was much improved and he saw nothing to suggest he was planning suicide. In fact, he found him very excited about his daughter's wedding although saddened that he would not be there. However, Blow concedes that things could have changed during the intervening few weeks.

Blow believes that foul play and suicide are equal possibilities. Pratt was not happy to be in the hospital, but he did not appear so depressed as to end his life. He never gave the slightest hint that he might do so and indeed often spoke about his plans when he was released. Blow said Pratt spoke of suicide on one occasion, saying the circumstances under which he would take his life would be if he had to spend the rest of his life in the hospital. However, at the time of his death there were ongoing efforts by his defence team to have him released on parole and everyone, including Pratt, was optimistic that this would happen soon, or at least within the next few years.

On the other hand, Blow is also well aware of the many doubtful "suicides" among prisoners. He believes it is possible that Pratt was murdered to ensure he was not released or to forestall his efforts for a retrial which would expose apartheid to public criticism. Blow argues that it would have been "very embarrassing" for the government if it had become known that a wealthy White man had shot Verwoerd because he opposed his policies; it would have been "much better" for the regime were Pratt to be declared insane and incarcerated. At the same time, Blow declines to rule out the possibility that Pratt, perhaps in a moment of deep depression, decided to end it all.⁷⁶⁴⁰

- Doreen Billson, Pratt's former partner who remained a friend and visited him often in the hospital, was stunned to hear of his death. She never believed that Pratt committed suicide and insisted that he was murdered. She said he was dreaming of the day he would be released and often told her of his plans to sail around the world.⁷⁶⁴¹

⁷⁶⁴⁰ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁴¹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, 'I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.'

- Elizabeth Radsma, Pratt's personal assistant, who visited him frequently, strongly believes that Pratt was murdered. "I do not think that he committed suicide, yes, they murdered him. He would not have committed suicide this way, especially just a few weeks before Susan's wedding. Impossible! In those days, you just didn't have a chance if you were against the government." According to Radsma, Pratt never gave her the slightest hint that he planned to commit suicide. On the contrary, he would speak about the future and about what he would do when he was released, since his parole hearing was coming soon.⁷⁶⁴²
- Dr. Solly Jacobson, Pratt's personal psychiatrist, was very surprised by his suicide.
- A frequent visitor, a clergyman, whose name was not given by the Sunday Times, but it is Father Macginnis, a Roman Catholic priest, said Pratt had mentioned to him the monotony of life in the institution and indicated that he was unhappy that he could not do any creative work. However, the Father Macginnis said he was surprised to hear that Pratt had died. Afterwards, he dismissed rumours that Pratt's mind had been deteriorating while in the hospital.⁷⁶⁴³
- Pratt's died shortly before his parole was to be discussed with a chance that he might be released.
- The way Pratt apparently chose to die is extraordinary, involving acrobatic physical effort for a middle-aged man, however fit, and resulting in agonising, slow strangulation. A man of his intelligence and determination could surely have found an easier way.
- There was no inquest, although such an inquiry was an automatic procedure in sudden deaths and suicides. This was curious, especially since the police had initially announced there would be one.
- Pratt's suicide note was never examined by a hand-writing expert to determine whether it was indeed his handwriting.
- The police who guarded Dimitri Tsafendas while he was in custody and forced him to undergo mock hangings warned him that he would "end up like David Pratt." Tsafendas ⁷⁶⁴² Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁶⁴³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015; Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, 'Pratt wrote fairy tales in hospital.'

assumed they were telling him that Pratt had not committed suicide, but that they had killed him and made it look like suicide and that this could happen to him, too.

- The authorities had good reasons for wanting Pratt dead. They knew about his plans for a retrial, having found the relevant documents in Blow's house. Thus they were aware that with prominent apartheid opponents such as Sir Paul Dukes, David Ennals, Harry Oppenheimer and Jeremy Thorpe as witnesses, a murder trial could be turned into a trial of apartheid. The propaganda damage to the regime would be immense. It is no coincidence that the authorities made it extremely difficult for Blow to see Pratt after discovering what the pair were up to.

The factors mentioned above are not conclusive but taken together are sufficient to raise suspicions. What is proven is that a number of deaths of prisoners during apartheid which were originally attributed to suicide or to natural causes, were actually murders. This was enough to require a proper investigation into the circumstances of Pratt's death.

DR. ALLAN BIRD'S CONSPIRACY THEORY

In 1992, the South African Dr. Allan Bird, Professor of Neurology at the University of the Witwatersrand and a private practitioner, published his autobiography, Bird on the Wing. In it he set out his theory that Dr. Solly Jacobson had plotted with Pratt, his patient at the time, to kill Dr. Verwoerd, after which Pratt would evade punishment by pleading insanity. Dr. Jacobson and Dr. Bird had been partners in a neurology practice in Johannesburg since 1952, but they held opposite views on politics. Bird supported the status quo while Jacobson was passionately anti-apartheid, a dedicated member of the Communist Party and one of Joe Slovo's closest friends.⁷⁶⁴⁴

Dr. Bird wrote how his suspicions were first raised:

“On one fateful occasion, together for some social event such as a birthday and chatting about the ugly turn the country's politics were taking, Solly, obviously under great tension, blurted out: ‘If Dr. Verwoerd goes on like this, HE IS GOING TO GET A BULLET.’ These were the actual words he used, and because of their gravity, fixed themselves in my *memory. I asked him to explain and he came out with a comment like, 'Dr. Verwoerd is a madman and is dragging the country to ruin.'*⁷⁶⁴⁵

⁷⁶⁴⁴ Bird 1992: 203, 218.

That Dr. Jacobson said Dr. Verwoerd "is going to get a bullet" can hardly be considered as evidence that he planned to kill the prime minister. It is the sort of remark anyone might make in the course of a heated political discussion. Presumably, the fact that Pratt had been Dr. Jacobson's patient played a role in Dr. Bird's subsequent assumption. In reality, however, if Dr. Jacobson was involved in any such plot, he was mostly unlikely to make such a threat in public, especially in front of Dr. Bird, who did not sympathise with his political ideas.

The second reason Bird became suspicious arose out of a telephone call. Bird was asleep in the middle of the night when his phone rang:

"It was Solly Jacobson. He was calling me to tell me that one of his patients, David Pratt, had shot the Prime Minister while he was opening the Rand Easter Agricultural Show at Milner Park that afternoon. The reason he was calling was because he feared that the assailant, who had been taken to the Police Forensic Laboratory for examination, might be undergoing physical torture to extract from him why he had carried out the deed.

Solly wanted me to go to the lab to establish what was happening to Pratt. 'Why should I have to go to the lab? He is not my patient, and I have never even set my eyes on him. If you consider it so important that someone should go and see what is going on, why don't you go yourself? After all, you know him and he is your patient.'

This futile discussion seemed to go on for several minutes and then Solly brought up a new point. 'Isie Maisels is with me and he thinks it would be better that you should go.' Maisels was a leading advocate and had been an acting judge. He was a close associate of Jacobson. When he heard that I was demurring, he came on the line himself and asked me to go to the lab, saying it would be better for all concerned – but I would not budge. Finally we said good night, but there was not much sleep for me that night ...

The next morning, Sunday, found Jacobson and myself back to routine and seeing our hospital patients. Jacobson looked washed out and weary and gave me a wan smile. 'What the hell was going on last night?' I half-jokingly asked him. 'In the end, Isie and I went down to the laboratory.' 'And?' 'There was nothing wrong going on. In fact they were treating Pratt very kindly.'”⁷⁶⁴⁶

⁷⁶⁴⁵ Bird 1992: 204-205.

The fact that Dr. Jacobson was concerned about Pratt seems perfectly natural since he was his patient. That he had reservations about visiting him and asked Dr. Bird to do so instead also seems logical, given that his anti-government disposition was almost certainly known to the authorities. Indeed, three years later he had to flee the country to avoid arrest.

Interestingly, Maisels does not make any reference in his own autobiography 'A life at Law' to visiting Pratt that evening. He states simply that he was approached by a firm of lawyers to represent Pratt. He makes no mention of seeing Pratt or being involved in the case before he was appointed by the law firm.

Although Dr. Bird described Maisels as a “close associate” of Jacobson, this description seems dubious in light of Maisels’ description of events in his autobiography. He gives a detailed description of the case, but nowhere does he mention visiting Pratt on the day of the shooting, while he does not refer to Dr. Jacobson at all. It is possible that Maisels was a close associate of Jacobson and did visit Pratt but made no mention of this in his autobiography. However, given the detail he expended on describing the case, this seems unlikely. If Dr. Jacobson was indeed a close associate of Maisels, Maisels presumably would have mentioned his name at least once in his autobiography, even with no connection to the Pratt case

During Pratt’s trial, Dr. Friedman said that he examined Pratt three hours after the shooting and he called Prof. Hurst to examine him, too. The doctors confirmed each other’s stories in court, but neither made any mention of Dr. Jacobson or Maisels being there at any point. Prof. Hurst did state that there was another doctor present who did not participate in the examination. He did not name the doctor. If the unnamed doctor was Jacobson, surely the fact that Pratt had been visited by his personal psychiatrist a few hours after the shooting would have become known, in or outside the court. There is no mention anywhere in the press, in the testimonies of Dr. Friedman or Prof. Hurst or in the trial minutes of Dr. Jacobson visiting Pratt that evening. As the media learned of the presence of Drs. Friedman and Hurst, probably they would have learned of Jacobson, too.

⁷⁶⁴⁶ Bird 1992: 207-208.

What is more, any visit to Pratt at the time would have been secured only through the police, yet there is no mention of it by the police. Such a visit would also have been known to the public prosecutor. However, when Dr. Jacobson testified at the trial, he made no mention of any such visit and the prosecutor did not ask him about one. To ignore such a visit by Pratt's personal psychiatrist, assuming such a visit had taken place, would have been an egregious omission by the prosecutor and the two doctors who had examined Pratt the day of the assault.

Dr. Bird claims that Dr. Jacobson told him the police treated Pratt "very kindly." It takes a feat of the imagination to picture the South African police force, with its reputation for brutality, dealing kindly with a man who had just shot their prime minister. However, imagination apart, Dr. Bird's claim is contradicted by Joe Slovo in his autobiography where he stated that when Pratt was brought to the Johannesburg Fort prison after the shooting, he was covered in blood. This could not have been blood from Pratt's reported beating by the crowd immediately after the attempt. Several hours had passed since then and it is unlikely that Dr. Friedman and Prof. Hurst left Pratt covered in blood after their examinations. None of the photographs taken at the scene of the shooting show Pratt as blood-stained; indeed, he appears normally dressed and unruffled, apart from slightly tousled hair. This again suggests that the beating and injuries he sustained, which the two doctors referred to, were caused by the police.

A point to consider is that Dr. Bird's book was published in 1992 when both Dr. Jacobson and Maisels were still alive and Maisels was living in South Africa. It seems unlikely that Dr. Bird would risk publishing untruths about two men who could challenge his accounts, although it is always possible that his memory played him false about events more than three decades earlier. In addition, his book was self-published, which means that it was not widely available and perhaps neither Jacobson nor Maisels was aware of it.

To conclude, the author cannot know for a fact if Maisels and Dr. Jacobson visited Pratt that day, but even if they did, this could not mean that Dr. Jacobson was involved in a conspiracy to kill Dr. Verwoerd. As Pratt's personal psychiatrist, Dr. Jacobson had every reason to be concerned about his welfare. Therefore, unless Joe Slovo and Isie Maisels lied, and Dr. Jacobson with Maisels managed to visit Pratt in custody and the police did not see them, then Dr. Bird's claim does not seem to be very accurate.

Bird's third suspicious incident related to the period immediately after Pratt's death:

"... Jacobson came to see me at home. He was distraught. Between sobs he told me that Pratt had hanged himself in a toilet at the hospital and he blamed himself for what had happened.

*As I was trying to console Solly, he told me that Pratt's original suicide attempt was brought about by Dr. Verwoerd's plans to introduce laws to impose apartheid through Parliament. But after treatment with psychotherapy and anti-depressant drugs, Pratt began to think more logically. Jacobson pointed out to him that, if he had died from the overdose, he would have achieved nothing towards curtailing apartheid. I gathered that between them they worked out a plan for Pratt to shoot Dr. Verwoerd. As he suffered from epilepsy, according to the Mental Disorders Act of 1916, he was insane and would not have to stand trial."*⁷⁶⁴⁷

What is disconcerting about this excerpt is the absence of a single quotation from Jacobson or Pratt to support Bird's conclusion that the two had engineered a plot to kill Dr. Verwoerd. Nothing could be vaguer than "I gathered that between them they worked out a plan for Pratt to shoot Dr. Verwoerd." Gathered what? Even if Jacobson ventured no more than his excerpt related, Bird seems to have been extraordinarily unresponsive in this situation, especially for a supporter of the regime. It took him four years to report his suspicions to the police. In 1964, he confided his beliefs to General van den Bergh, who, according to Dr. Bird, replied that they were "speculative," though he admitted that Jacobson's "activities aroused suspicion."⁷⁶⁴⁸

As for other aspects of the Jacobson-Bird meeting, it is difficult to perceive a sinister intent in Dr. Jacobson's remark that if Pratt had committed suicide, he would have achieved nothing "towards curtailing apartheid." This is surely often said to mentally fragile patients, that "if you die, you will achieve nothing, but if you live ..." It is a counsel of encouragement, not, as Dr. Bird seemed to think, a reprieve providing a fresh opportunity to kill.

In 1936, Stefan Lux, a Slovak Jewish journalist, committed suicide in the League of Nations building in Geneva to protest against the growing persecution of Jews in Germany and to raise awareness of the oppression. Swiss journalist Léon Savary commented: "People bold enough to fight for justice shouldn't kill themselves, but stay at their position."⁷⁶⁴⁹ In ⁷⁶⁴⁷ Bird, 1992: 209.

⁷⁶⁴⁸ Bird, 1992: 212.

⁷⁶⁴⁹ Levani (Le Monde Juif), January-March 1966, 'Il y a trente ans: Stefan Lux.'

1970, Costas Georgakis, a Greek student in Italy, committed suicide by setting himself on fire in the Matteotti square in Genoa as a protest against the dictatorial regime in Greece. He was not insane and no-one asked him to do it. However, there was a widespread feeling that such a determined and intelligent man should have stayed alive to fight the dictatorship. The most convincing argument against committing suicide as a form of political protest is: Remain alive and you will be more useful for the struggle. Even if Dr. Jacobson had encouraged Pratt to remain alive in order to fight apartheid, this does not suggest that he “programmed” him to assassinate Dr. Verwoerd.

With regard to the purported agreement between Pratt and Dr. Jacobson that Pratt would kill Dr. Verwoerd then plead insanity, this is wholly inconsistent with Pratt’s known attitude. He vigorously challenged the attempts by his daughter Susan to have him declared insane. He even forbade his defence team to bring his medical records to the court and this was done only after Susan’s application. Pratt even changed his defence team when they pressed the necessity of his pleading insanity.

A fourth incident strengthened Dr. Bird’s suspicions. That was in 1966 when he heard that Tsafendas was also treated by Dr. Jacobson. However, this was quite wrong, because Dr. Jacobson never treated Tsafendas. This case is discussed in Chapter Six and will not be discussed here again, but let us see what Dr. Bird did regarding his unfounded suspicions. Once again, he felt it was his patriotic duty to inform the police about his suspicions regarding his former partner. This time he spoke to Brigadier Johan Coetzee of the security police. Coetzee agreed to look at the case. Dr. Bird then heard nothing from Coetzee until 1979, when he claimed Coetzee said he had established that Tsafendas was indeed treated by Dr. Jacobson in England shortly or immediately before Tsafendas’s departure for South Africa.⁷⁶⁵⁰

However, according to Dr. Bird, Coetzee said there was not enough evidence to ask for Dr. Jacobson’s extradition from England. Dr. Bird suggested that Coetzee’s unwillingness to pursue the matter further might have to do with the fact that Dr. Jacobson was Jewish and the Brigadier “had an unusually friendly leaning towards the Israelis.”⁷⁶⁵¹ Finally, Desmond Blow and Elizabeth Radsma both dismissed Dr. Bird’s theory out of hand. Radsma ⁷⁶⁵⁰ Bird, 214-215.

⁷⁶⁵¹ Bird, 214-215.

characterised the claim as “ridiculous,”⁷⁶⁵² while Blow bust out laughing when the author mentioned it, although he was aware of the theory. Blow was so dismissive of the theory that he told the author jokingly, “I thought you were a serious researcher!” To this, the author replied, “I am a serious researcher, that’s why I want to examine everything that has been written about the case.”⁷⁶⁵³

It is obvious that Dr. Bird’s theory that Jacobson and Pratt colluded to kill Dr. Verwoerd is nonsense and we are left to wonder why he concocted it. The answer may lie in his political beliefs, which point to the type of person he was. Twice he turned voluntarily informant in the service of one of the world’s most brutal and repressive regimes. More importantly the person he offered to sacrifice was a “friend” and former business partner, a married man with children, whose only crime was that he opposed the regime which Dr. Bird served. That his case against Jacobson was somewhere between fragile and non-existent was irrelevant because this was a time when the apartheid police did not need evidence to arrest anyone, but merely a suspicion. It was a time, according to the TRC, on which “torture was the dominant form of violation by the apartheid police.”⁷⁶⁵⁴

A paragraph in his autobiography set out Dr. Bird’s changing attitude towards Jacobson and demonstrates how he felt justified in informing on him to the police. He wrote:

“Both Jacobson and (Nelson) Mandela were camp-followers of the South African Communist Party before its banning. After the Rivonia Trial, when it was established that there was a Communist plot to seize power in South Africa, I began to see Jacobson in a more sinister light – no longer as an altruistic, starry-eyed worker for freedom, but as an international terrorist, aiming with his cohorts, to conquer the world.”⁷⁶⁵⁵

Dr. Bird’s remark needs no comment as it tells us everything we need to know about his character and the way he perceived things. What seems curious about Dr. Bird is that he wrote all this in 1992 without any sign of shame that he had served the by then widely discredited apartheid regime. Obviously he felt proud of his patriotic efforts to save his country from Communist/Jewish terrorists who wanted to conquer the world.

⁷⁶⁵² Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁶⁵³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁵⁴ Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 3, 1998: 530.

⁷⁶⁵⁵ Bird, 1992: 212.

COMMENTS ON PRATT'S CHARACTER AND STATE OF MIND

What is perhaps the most impressive aspect of Pratt's life story is the way his friends and acquaintances rallied round to save his life or even just express their solidarity. Their attitude says a lot about his character and the esteem in which he was widely held. Several friends underwent the ordeal of a court appearance during which they withheld incriminating facts about Pratt, such as his hatred for Dr. Verwoerd and apartheid, while exaggerating incidents in a way that would support the insanity plea. A small number were even willing to risk their freedom and perhaps more to help him escape from prison. It seems impossible that all these people, including Oppenheimer, Ennals, Thorpe and Dukes, would have agreed to defend him if they thought he was insane or they did not sympathize with him.

On a wider scale, friends and comrades from the Liberal Party in Britain and the anti-apartheid movement there organized a fund-raising, not because he needed the money, but as a gesture of solidarity. His activities in London demonstrated the trust and acceptance which like-minded Britons extended towards him. That a Liberal Parliamentary candidate took Pratt campaigning with him to, of all places, the 10 Downing Street home of the Conservative Prime Minister Harold Macmillan, testifies to the admiration and trust extended to this White opponent from the land of apartheid. That members of the Liberal Social Club and MPs of the Liberal Party, like Jeremy Thorpe and Bruce Hewes, were willing to go to court on Pratt's behalf demonstrates the esteem in which he was held. It is impossible to believe they would have acted in this way for someone they believed to be insane.

Pratt's stature in British liberal circles is reflected in the fact that he was a member of the exclusive National Liberal Club, on whose membership rolls were inscribed a wide range of prominent persons, including its founder, William Ewart Gladstone, Sir Winston Churchill and other British prime ministers. More importantly, Pratt was allowed to remain a member despite his arraignment for shooting a prime minister.

None of the people who knew him well is on record as believing Pratt was insane. He suffered from epilepsy and was characterised at times as impulsive, depressed and difficult. Some speculated that he had a psychological problem, almost certainly meaning his depression, but no-one ever claimed that he acted like a lunatic or reported things he said which might suggest he was insane.

Elizabeth Radsma and Noel Spiller, two of the defence's main witnesses, spoke later about their difficult situation at the trial and their efforts to give weight to the insanity plea, while concealing Pratt's loathing for apartheid. Subsequently, they declared flatly that Pratt was perfectly sane. Fr. Orsmond, who also knew Pratt very well, testified in the same manner as Radsma and Spiller.

Indisputable proof of Pratt's clarity in speech, thought and writing is contained in his own words as presented in this study, during his speech at the trial and in his personal letters and notes. Nothing in them could remotely suggest that he was mentally unstable. On the contrary, everything Pratt says or writes is lucid and to the point throughout. What is also evident is that his writing reflects his state of mind while in prison and hospital. Pratt does not write simple letters, but describes in detail his life in custody. We see not only how he spent his time, but more importantly how he concealed some of his activities. Sprinkling sugar grains on the ground leading to his cell so that he could hear the warders coming was indicative of his intelligent forethought, as was giving code-names to the witnesses he wanted to testify. The logical, detailed planning set out in his "Method for approaching trial," is evidence of a clear head and a lively intelligence, hardly the attributes of a mentally unstable person.

Pratt's political ideas and activities were widely reported in the foreign press, but not in the South African media due to the ban on mentioning his name. Almost certainly, the prohibition was meant to prevent South Africans from learning of Pratt's political activities and beliefs. The ban not only concealed Pratt's attitude to the government but blocked positive information about him carried by the foreign press.

Pratt was a sensitive man who adored his children and cared deeply for the people around him. He built homes and a school for his African workers and gave refuge on his farm to penniless and homeless Blacks from elsewhere. He donated regularly to charities and he paid the school fees for the children of friends less well off than himself.

His love for his children led him to make sometimes desperate attempts to see them. This was not insanity but the mark of a loving father. Right up to the time of his death, he wrote fairy tales for the children who were never far from his mind. The foregoing are just some examples of Pratt's humanity as seen by friends and acquaintances. Let us now consider what they had to say about his mental state:

- Fr. Orsmond said he found Pratt to be "a very concerned person, concerned for things of justice, and he had a great mercy for people suffering illness or poverty. I do know that he wasn't an evil man. I do know that he would not have committed a cold-blooded murder just for the sake of cold-blooded murder. I doubt even if he would defend himself if he was personally being attacked by trying to kill the oppressor, the attacker. But in this case there was more than just the life of one man; in this case there were really the lives of thousands and thousands of people, and the future of the country. In some ways he could have seen that, in his conscience, as a noble thing. And if he saw it as a noble thing, he could not be condemned as having a bad conscience, no... Well, as far as I am concerned, on the whole, if you look at him and you think of him and you just talking to him, I don't think he... well, you couldn't call him insane. You couldn't call him, say, schizophrenic or anything like that, but he was odd. I think that's the best word – he was odd, but certainly not insane.”⁷⁶⁵⁶

- Bruce Hewes, former vice-chairman of the Westminster Constituent Liberal Party in London, said, “I think it is wrong to write Mr. Pratt off as a madman. He was not the sort of chap to go around shouting ‘Down with Dr. Verwoerd.’ He would go and do something about it. He helped us a great deal with door-to-door canvassing. He didn't talk very much, but he struck me as being perfectly sane.”⁷⁶⁵⁷
- Mr. R. Clark, manager of Pratt's farm, speaking two days after the shooting, said, “Mr. Pratt returned from Europe about six weeks ago and appeared to be entirely normal. He is a temperamental man who is easily upset, but that is all. I did not notice any other change in his behaviour.”⁷⁶⁵⁸
- Elizabeth Radsma spoke at length of a man she knew well as his personal assistant: “David was a very sensitive man. Due to his sensitivity, he often fell into depression. Mostly they were two things that gave him depression -- the fact that he was not unable to be constantly with his two small children who he absolutely adored, and then it was apartheid. He would often get into depression when reading about arrests and violence. He would even get depressed by seeing poor people in the streets. He was definitely not insane, not at all. The only thing wrong with his health was his epilepsy... He was very intelligent and educated. He was a very generous, compassionate and kind man... he hated Dr. Verwoerd for what he was doing to the Black people. He hated apartheid and ⁷⁶⁵⁶ Father Orsmond in Guy Spiller's The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

⁷⁶⁵⁷ Evening Standard, 11 April 1960: 1, ‘Death for gunman?’

⁷⁶⁵⁸ Verster (Die Vaderland), 11 April 1960: 4, ‘Pratt se plaas: So lyk dit.’

Dr. Verwoerd and wanted to stop both, we all knew that, we just did not expect that he will go and shot Dr. Verwoerd.”⁷⁶⁵⁹

- Doreen Billson, who knew Pratt since 1948, said, “I am positive he was not mentally ill. He did, however, suffer strange visions – a euphoria which is a known side-effect from taking regular doses of a drug which controls epileptic attacks.”⁷⁶⁶⁰
- Desmond Blow, the Sunday Times reporter who became close to Pratt, told the author that he was “very fond” of him.⁷⁶⁶¹ Not for a moment did he think that Pratt was insane and considered him to be “very sane.”⁷⁶⁶² On the contrary, Blow found Pratt to be “very alert and intelligent.” He also characterised him as “a gentleman and most likeable.” As for his political ideas, Blow described Pratt as “a very concerned man, genuinely concerned about the social injustice that was taking place in South Africa;” he was “very anti-racist and very much against Verwoerd and apartheid. He wanted apartheid to end and would have done whatever he thought it might take to achieve that.”⁷⁶⁶³ The admiration that Blow felt for Pratt is evident in the fact that he named his son David after him.⁷⁶⁶⁴ It is unthinkable that a serious man would name his son after a “schizophrenic” who suffered from “megalomania” and a “martyr/saviour” complex.
- A clergyman whose name was not given by the Sunday Times, but it is Father Macginnis, said that he had always found Pratt, who he knew well, to be logical and reasonable.⁷⁶⁶⁵
- Joe Slovo was impressed by Pratt’s character and his political thinking. He considered him to be “a very brave man” and never got the impression he was a schizophrenic or a megalomaniac.⁷⁶⁶⁶
- Noel Spiller described his speech at the trial as a “wonderful address” and stressed the difficult position she found herself in when asked by the defence to support the insanity plea when she knew Pratt was not insane.⁷⁶⁶⁷

⁷⁶⁵⁹ Elizabeth Radsma in a personal interview, 9 January 2017.

⁷⁶⁶⁰ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, ‘I loved David Pratt-wonderful, sad man.’

⁷⁶⁶¹ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁶² Graham David Blow in a personal interview, 22 October 2017.

⁷⁶⁶³ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁶⁴ Graham David Blow in a personal interview, 8 October 2017.

⁷⁶⁶⁵ Sunday Express, 8 October 1961: 3, ‘Pratt wrote fairy tales in hospital.’

⁷⁶⁶⁶ Desmond Blow in a personal interview, 11 May 2015.

⁷⁶⁶⁷ Noel Spiller in Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

- Sue Charter said, “Although that was what the trial had described David as – the criminally insane – and, you know, put him into that position, it (the hospital) was full of people who were very, very different from him. He was still, to all intents and purposes, very much the way he was outside. I mean, he appeared very sane and very relaxed, although he did speak of being very depressed, obviously, at times.”⁷⁶⁶⁸

CONCLUSION

David Pratt was described by one of his best friends, Fr. Orsmond, as “a very concerned person, concerned for things of justice, and he had a great mercy for people suffering illness or poverty.” Pratt was very wealthy, compassionate and extraordinarily generous. A believer in the benefits of education, he paid for poor people’s studies and built and financed a school for Black children on his farm. He contributed to charities and constantly helped people in need, both White and non-White. He was an epileptic from the age of eight years but this did not prevent him from pursuing his many aims and ambitions.

Pratt built modern and comfortable apartment houses on his farm for his Black employees. He was known to be such a good employer that friends and relatives of his labour force would ask to work for him. Even if he had no jobs, he would allow them to stay in his farm. Before long, the apartments housed more than the stipulated single family. Pratt did not object but offered food to everyone who lived there.

The driving force in Pratt’s life was his concern for social justice. As a wealthy White man, he was in a position to gain from the rule of apartheid, but he was strongly opposed to the racist doctrine that governed South Africa and did everything he could to fight it. In 1954, he tried to form a political coalition with Nicolaas Havenga and Harry Oppenheimer as a means of defeating the National Party and ending apartheid. His efforts failed but he did not give up. He joined and contributed generously to the South African Liberal Party, seeking to expand its outreach. In Britain, he joined the Liberal Party and joined enthusiastically in its activities. He spoke at meetings against apartheid and urged Britons to boycott South African goods. He also worked for the party at the 1959 General Election, canvassing on foot for the Liberal candidate in the Westminster constituency.

⁷⁶⁶⁸ Sue Charter in Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate, 1999.

His vision of a non-racist South Africa and his willingness to die for his principles were widely misunderstood and he was seen instead as a mentally disordered, a megalomaniac, a would-be Messiah who saw himself as some kind of saviour or martyr. This perception may have carried some weight if Pratt had achieved nothing, but here was someone who provided houses for his workers and a school for their children, who travelled to London and urged the British to boycott South African exports, who tried by constitutional means to defeat the racist engineers of the system he hated. If this was megalomania, could not the same be said of the French magnate Jean-Yves Ollivier, who arrived in South Africa and decided he would take on apartheid on his own? Their only difference is that Pratt failed to beat apartheid, while Ollivier, operating in a more positive political climate, succeeded. Had there been more “megalomaniacs” like Pratt, deliverance would have come to South Africa sooner.

As for Pratt’s willingness to die for an idea, is this a sign of mental disorder? History is full of such people. Indeed, only three years later, Nelson Mandela made a similar statement at the Rivonia Trial. Yet he was never presented as mentally disordered or lampooned as someone who saw himself as a national saviour or martyr.

In considering the references to mental instability, Pratt’s epilepsy was clearly a factor. This life-long condition frequently caused him to become depressed, requiring recurring treatment, including almost constant medication. The medication intended to ward off epileptic episodes often had unwanted effects, most notably a state of euphoria which sometimes affected his judgment. Even so, epilepsy is not a mental disease.

However, when it came to apartheid and politics, Pratt was invariably lucid and logical. When he spoke at length in court about his assault on Dr. Verwoerd, he outlined his ideology and addressed his motives in language that was perfectly clear. His address from the dock was a condemnation of apartheid and of Dr. Verwoerd’s policies, without the slightest indication of insanity. His letters and his essays likewise bear no sign of insanity.

One of the extraordinary aspects of the Pratt case is the way so many people rallied to save him. His daughter, friends and work colleagues pressured him to plead insanity and several negotiated uncomfortable appearances in court on his behalf. Other friends, unknown to us, involved themselves in at least three attempts to help him escape, thereby risking their own freedom. Would anyone do such a thing for a man who was insane? In England, anti-apartheid activists and members of the Liberal and Labour parties raised money for Pratt’s defence. In view of his wealth, the cash was irrelevant, but the gesture reflected their loyalty to a man who had impressed them by his devotion to the anti-apartheid cause. Members of the anti-apartheid movement wrote letters to the Commonwealth Relations Office and to the British Foreign Office in London, urging them to intervene in Pratt's case and ensure that he would get a fair trial.

It is inconceivable that a man portrayed as he was at his trial - a danger to himself and others, unsociable, mentally ill, lacking political interest, seized by a martyr/saviour complex - would have all these people fighting on his side. Had his friends believed Pratt was mentally ill, they would have known he could not be hanged; their mobilization showed that they knew he was sane and considered his execution a real possibility.

An important point needs to be made with regard to medical evidence. This is that with the exception of Dr. Friedman and Prof. Hurst, all the doctors who testified in court or whose reports were handed in, knew Pratt very well, and none of them certified him as being mentally disordered before the trial. In the case of Prof. Hurst, even if he was not acquainted with Pratt, he was a regular guest at the latter's Crayfish Inn and a friend of Pratt's business partner and friend Noel Spiller. From this we can assume he was aware of who Pratt was and almost certainly asked Spiller for her opinion of Pratt after he examined him. As for Dr. Friedman, he found nothing wrong with Pratt, apart from his physical injuries. Dr. Chesler, who thought Pratt was unable to look after his own affairs, admitted under cross-examination, that his diagnosis could have been wrong and other psychiatrists could disagree with it.

We should remember that Pratt left for Joe Slovo and other imprisoned anti-apartheid activists an exercise book which, according to Slovo, contained "very elaborate and fanciful exhortations for joint efforts against racism."⁷⁶⁶⁹ This is not the action of a mentally unstable man or of a megalomaniac; it is something done by a selfless and principled man, who loathed racism and apartheid and cared deeply about South Africa and the people. Although Pratt's plans might have appeared "fanciful" to Slovo, the fact that Pratt went to considerable trouble to work them out demonstrates once again his determination and dedication to fight racism. Finally, we should also remember that Pratt wrote to Dr. Verwoerd that the "vast inarticulate majority of South Africans are bitterly opposed to the policies you have been pursuing with such utter ruthlessness... Every human being has a basic dignity, and when you attempt to destroy this, you come up against the force of God... it is better for a man to die for a principle than to live in contradiction thereto.”⁷⁶⁷⁰

⁷⁶⁶⁹ Slovo, 1995: 133.

The author believes that David Pratt’s case should be re-examined in detail in all of its aspects but most especially his death. His death, reported as “suicide,” deserves the sort of investigation given to that of Ahmed Timol in 2017. Finally, Pratt’s own words signal the kind of man he was:

“... every South African, Afrikaner, English South African, Coloured, Indian, Bantu, Malay, every person in South Africa has got to play his part if we are to build the South Africa that I know can be built... a glittering future waiting for her as long as she observes the basic laws of God and human dignity, which of course, means, in the words, I think, of Macmillan at the time, ‘Rule by merit and not pigment of skin.’ South Africa has to throw off the slimy snake apartheid which is gripping its throat.”⁷⁶⁷¹

Were these words, or those in his letter to Dr. Verwoerd, the words of an insane man or of a megalomaniac?

⁷⁶⁷⁰ Guy Spiller’s The Liberal and the Pirate. 1999.

⁷⁶⁷¹ David Pratt’s testimony in the Enquiry regarding his mental condition in Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt, 13 September 1960. The State versus David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. NASA.

AFTERMATH AND CONCLUSION

AFTERMATH

AMNESTY EFFORTS

Tsafendas remained in prison until 1994 and then spent the final five years of his life in Sterkfontein mental hospital. From 1966 to 1994, the only person who visited him – apart from the priests, a social worker, and the two brief visits by David Bloomberg (discussed earlier) – was one of his Shangaan students, who by the late 1980s had become the chief of his tribe. However, Tsafendas was not allowed to converse with his friend because the warders did not speak Portuguese or Shangaan.⁷⁶⁷²

On November 24, 1994, Mr. Jody Kollapen – then a lawyer with the organization Lawyers for Human Rights, and now a High Court Judge in Pretoria – attempted to secure an amnesty for Tsafendas and have him released from the hospital. He wrote a memorandum to the new democratically elected regional government, stating that:

“Dimitrio Tsafendas has been South Africa’s longest serving prisoner... To our knowledge he was the only State President’s patient who was not held in a mental institution but in a prison and we have no doubts whatsoever that the reasons for that were purely political and were based on inflicting the maximum amount of suffering upon the man who killed the so called architect and grandmaster of apartheid ...

It remains my belief that Mr. Tsafendas should not die a lonely man in an institution but should spend the last years of his life in the company of people he knows and perhaps trusts ... In summation I believe that the man has served his debt to the society (if he owed a debt at all in the first place). His age and disposition certainly do not warrant him being held in an institution and if it was possible to release him either to family or into an old age institution run by the State this might be the best approach to follow at the present time.”⁷⁶⁷³

⁷⁶⁷² Jody Kollapen memorandum regarding Dimitrio Tsafendas. 24 November 1994. Tsafendas’s file in the Lawyers for Human Rights collection (AL3183). SAHA; Father Minas Constandinou in a personal interview, 6 February 2013.

⁷⁶⁷³ Memorandum of Jody Kollapen of Lawyers for Human Rights, 24 November 1994. Tsafendas’s file in the Lawyers for Human Rights collection (AL3183). SAHA.

The ANC government was willing to release Tsafendas, but because he was unable to look after himself, Kollapen attempted to find someone who could look after him after he was released. He personally contacted Tsafendas's family, but they refused, claiming they were too old to look after him. Subsequently, Kollapen contacted the Greek community in Pretoria asking them to place Tsafendas in an old people's home which was owned by the local Greek Orthodox Church. The Greeks refused, claiming that having Tsafendas living in their old people's home would attract negative publicity for the local community and that could harm their business with a possible boycott by White South Africans. Kollapen then even asked the regional government to intervene with his family, suggesting that if the government "were to approach the family their response might well be different."⁷⁶⁷⁴ Despite Kollapen's endless efforts, the release of Tsafendas from the hospital did not materialise due to the fact that no one was willing to care for him.⁷⁶⁷⁵

THE TRC

Jody Kollapen was not the only jurist to take an interest in Tsafendas's case. In late 1996, Mr. Krish Govender, an anti-apartheid activist, human rights lawyer at the time and future Durban State Attorney and co-chairman of the Law Society of South Africa, submitted to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission that Tsafendas's case should be "reviewed and investigated." Govender said that the purpose of his submission was to query how Tsafendas as "a State President's patient" could have landed up on Death Row for twenty-eight years. He said in his request that "all decisions, documents and material [regarding Tsafendas's case] must be reviewed and investigated thoroughly. He should be visited by members of the TRC urgently to reassure him that mechanisms for justice or him are taking shape. The public needs to be reassured about his safety, well-being and state of mind, before something happens to him."⁷⁶⁷⁶

It was a natural request since it was well-known how the legal system operated during apartheid. Professor John Dugard told the author that he, like many other South Africans, ⁷⁶⁷⁴ Memorandum of Jody Kollapen of Lawyers for Human Rights, 24 November 1994. Tsafendas's file in the Lawyers for Human Rights collection (AL3183). SAHA.

⁷⁶⁷⁵ Judge Jody Kollapen in a personal interview, 16 April 2015.

⁷⁶⁷⁶ Liza Key letter to Dr. Meryl Vorster, 14 October 1997. Personal Collection of Liza Key.

including jurists, “suspected that there was a political cover-up in the Tsafendas case.”⁷⁶⁷⁷ He also said of the judges in the case:

“I suspect that the government was very careful when it came to appointing judges to hear the Tsafendas case, and so that would explain why both Beyers and van Wyk were involved. They were certainly political persons and they owed their appointments to the government. Van Wyk was politically very much in favour of the government, so it would not surprise me at all that van Wyk decided either under pressure, but I suspect not under pressure, probably he just felt ... and he was in touch with all the top National Party people, socially. He would probably have got the message that it was better, as far as the government was concerned, that Tsafendas be found to be insane.”⁷⁶⁷⁸

However, the then Chief Justice Michael Corbett,⁷⁶⁷⁹ ignorant of the facts about Tsafendas, rejected the suggestion and characterised it as “pointless and absurd,” because of what he considered to be overwhelming evidence presented to the court regarding Tsafendas’s mental health.⁷⁶⁸⁰ Subsequently, as result of Govender’s request, Liza Key, the researcher and filmmaker who had met Tsafendas and made a documentary about him, was asked by Govender and the TRC to make a submission on Tsafendas’s behalf. Key brought some evidence to the TRC about Tsafendas that had not been known at the time, for example his statement to the police where he had given clear political reasons as his motives for killing Dr. Verwoerd. However, also thanks to Corbett, Tsafendas’s case was not investigated further.

It should also be mentioned that Govender’s request was part of a submission he had made to the TRC entitled “Injustice under apartheid judiciary,” asking the Commission to investigate the judiciary’s conduct under apartheid and calling for all judges who had held office prior to 1994 to be held accountable for their conduct before the Commission. It was an eminently reasonable request and something that should have already been done, as it was common knowledge that the South African legal system had been an integral part of the ⁷⁶⁷⁷ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 8 September 2016.

⁷⁶⁷⁸ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 7 February 2016.

⁷⁶⁷⁹ Justice Michael Corbett (1923-2007) was appointed Chief Justice in late 1988 (Dyzenhaus, 2010: 163). In 1991, Justice Corbett served as co-chairman of the Convention for a Democratic South Africa (CODESA), a negotiating forum, which held negotiations between the apartheid government and anti-apartheid organizations such as the ANC and the South African Communist Party (Dyzenhaus, 2010: 40). He was supposed to retire from his position as Chief Justice in 1993, but the Cabinet asked him to stay on for another year; then Nelson Mandela and the Cabinet asked him to remain in his position until the end of 1996 (Kahn, 1997: 209).

⁷⁶⁸⁰ Dyzenhaus, 2003: 37-44.

repressive machinery of the apartheid system.⁷⁶⁸¹ In addition, the TRC itself had revealed and exposed the inaccuracies and bias of some of the death inquests (for example into the Steve Biko case) and the Commissions of Inquiry (for example the Commissions about the Sharpeville Massacre and the Soweto uprising).

In previous years, several prominent jurists had also exposed the biased and non-independent nature of the judiciary during apartheid, and how the National Party had appointed judges who supported its policies. The list of prominent jurists and legal experts who have written about and exposed the disgraceful conduct of the South African judiciary during apartheid is endless. For example, Professor John Dugard has expressed “outrage and shame” about the South African legal system during apartheid,⁷⁶⁸² characterising it as “abnormal.” He wrote:

“A legal system that excludes 70% of its population from the franchise, that excludes 70% of its population from owning land in 87% of the country, that arbitrarily deprives 8 million people of their nationality, that has forcibly relocated many millions of people on account of their race, that formally executes some 160 persons per year, that authorizes repression in the name of national security and that permits international aggression, [is] . . . a grossly abnormal one.”⁷⁶⁸³

In 1978, Professor Dugard had also characterised the judiciary during apartheid as an “old-fashioned, inquisitional system modelled upon a code produced by the Spanish Inquisition, one which bears little resemblance to the enlightened codes of procedure found in modern Western European countries.”⁷⁶⁸⁴ On the subject of Commissions of Inquiry during the apartheid years, Professor Dugard said: “One of the most disgraceful things about South Africa during this period was the way in which judicial commissions were manipulated, and also the way in which inquest inquiries were conducted and the magistrates just ignored the evidence. (The judges) knew how to make a finding that would help the government. That was very clear.”⁷⁶⁸⁵

⁷⁶⁸¹ SATIS, 1985: 5.

⁷⁶⁸² Klug, 2000: 660.

⁷⁶⁸³ Klug, 2000: 659-660.

⁷⁶⁸⁴ Dugard, 1978: 273.

⁷⁶⁸⁵ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 7 February 2016.

In 1986, Nicholas Haysom had exposed the bias and inaccuracy of the Kannemeyer Commission of Enquiry into the Langa shootings.⁷⁶⁸⁶ Sydney Kentridge, QC wrote in 1998: “In South Africa, one after another inquest into deaths in detention found that ‘no one was to blame’ as the security police, the judiciary and district surgeons conspired to keep torture and murder under wraps.”⁷⁶⁸⁷ Ahmed Kathrada wrote on the same issue in 2004, “In later years, inquest after inquest – in the cases of Imam Haron, Ahmed Timol, Neil Aggett, to name but a few – returned verdicts of suicide. I cannot recall a single case among the scores of deaths under 90-day detention in which an inquest magistrate held the security police responsible.”⁷⁶⁸⁸

According to Adam Sitze, Professor of Law (2013), Commissions of Inquiry under apartheid very often hid more than they revealed. A typical example, he wrote, was the Sharpeville inquiry, which transformed itself from a fact-finding device into a “whitewashing machine.”⁷⁶⁸⁹ Austin T. Turk, Professor of Criminology at the University of California, wrote in 1982 that apartheid South Africa may well have had “the world’s most elaborate legal structure for the repression of political resistance of all kinds.”⁷⁶⁹⁰

In addition, Govender’s suggestion was supported by several legal bodies in South Africa, such as the Black Lawyers Association, Lawyers for Human Rights, the Legal Resources Centre and the National Association of Democratic Lawyers. These bodies argued that “lawyers and courts under apartheid, with very few and notable exceptions, had co-operated in servicing and enforcing a diabolically unjust political order ... Judicial independence was a myth that had been exploded in the daily experience of the courts.”⁷⁶⁹¹

Because of Govender’s submission, the TRC invited the legal community, including Chief Justice Corbett, to appear before it in a hearing.⁷⁶⁹² The Commission’s invitation emphasised that the purpose of the hearing involving the legal community was not “to establish guilt or hold individuals responsible ... the hearing is an attempt to understand the role the legal system played in contributing to the violation and/or protection of human rights

⁷⁶⁸⁶ Haysom, N. (1986) “The Langa Shootings and the Kannemeyer Commission of Enquiry.”

⁷⁶⁸⁷ Quoted in Bizos, 1998: vii.

⁷⁶⁸⁸ Kathrada, 2004: 384.

⁷⁶⁸⁹ Sitze, 2013: 157, 311.

⁷⁶⁹⁰ Turk, 1982: 146.

⁷⁶⁹¹ Klug, 2000: 658.

⁷⁶⁹² Dyzenhaus, 2003: 37.

and to identify institutional changes required to prevent those abuses which occurred from happening again.”⁷⁶⁹³

In the end, much to the Commission’s dismay, not a single judge or magistrate accepted the invitation. Some judges, including Chief Justice Corbett, responded by sending memorandums. Corbett made it clear in his memorandum that although he was not speaking on behalf of the “judiciary as a whole,” he had distributed his memorandum “among the present members of the Appellate Division” and that it bore “their endorsement.”⁷⁶⁹⁴ In his memorandum, despite all the previously quoted evidence about the judiciary, Corbett staunchly defended its record under apartheid; he praised the judges and said that the record of judicial decisions during apartheid was “generally” good,⁷⁶⁹⁵ while he claimed that “the courts had no option but to apply the law as they found it, however unjust it might appear to be.”⁷⁶⁹⁶ Finally, he “objected on practical and constitutional grounds” to Govender’s suggestion that all judges and magistrates should be brought before the Commission.⁷⁶⁹⁷

The chairman of the TRC, Archbishop Desmond Tutu, the Minister of Justice and other members of the Commission openly expressed their disappointment in the judges’ and magistrates’ behaviour. Archbishop Tutu said that given the importance of the occasion, the written submissions by some judges were not enough: they should have appeared in front of the Commission in person.⁷⁶⁹⁸ The Commission’s report said that “The failure of the judiciary to appear is all the more to be lamented when the historic significance of the Commission is considered, as well as its envisaged role in the transformation of South African society into a caring, humane and just one.”⁷⁶⁹⁹ Advocate Clifford Mailer commented that “The truth is that few judges on the bench embrace the new culture of human rights and [they] are hostile to change.”⁷⁷⁰⁰

The TRC was very critical of the judiciary for its role during apartheid.⁷⁷⁰¹ It said in its report that: “The Commission has a good deal of understanding for the ‘collegiality’ argument, which says that the non-appearance by those judges willing in principle to appear ⁷⁶⁹³ Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 4, 1998: 95.

⁷⁶⁹⁴ Dyzenhaus, 2003: 37.

⁷⁶⁹⁵ Dyzenhaus, 2003: 37-53.

⁷⁶⁹⁶ Klug, 2000: 658.

⁷⁶⁹⁷ Dyzenhaus, 2003: 37.

⁷⁶⁹⁸ Currie, 2011: 220.

⁷⁶⁹⁹ Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 4, 1998: 107.

⁷⁷⁰⁰ Arnold, 2000: 15.

⁷⁷⁰¹ Currie, 2011: 219-220; Meiring, 1999: 247-251.

will create greater mutual trust among the ‘old order’ and the ‘new order’ judges and so advance the cause of constitutional democracy. However, such benefits, if achieved in this way, are outweighed by the powerful symbolic effect of the judiciary showing themselves publicly and humbly to be accountable. For this is what the hearing was about and what the Constitution demands of a judiciary that is granted the onerous power of constitutional review. It is required that the judiciary display some sense of being able to balance its necessary and justifiable demand for independence with a measure of accountability to the South African nation it serves. The Commission deplores and regrets the almost complete failure of the magistracy to respond to the Commission’s invitation, the more so considering the previous lack of formal independence of magistrates and their dismal record as servants of the apartheid state in the past. They and the country lost an opportunity to examine their role in the transition from oppression to democracy.⁷⁷⁰²

The Commission’s findings regarding the role of the judiciary during apartheid were also very critical:

“Part of the reason for the longevity of apartheid was the superficial adherence to ‘rule by law’ by the National Party (NP), whose leaders craved the aura of legitimacy that ‘the law’ bestowed on their harsh injustice ... In the intervening thirty years, however, the courts and the organised legal profession generally and subconsciously or unwittingly connived in the legislative and executive pursuit of injustice, as was pointed out by a few at the time and acknowledged by so many at the hearing. Perhaps the most common form of subservience can be captured in the maxim qui tacet consentire (silence gives consent). There were, nevertheless, many parts of the profession that actively contributed to the entrenchment and defence of apartheid through the courts.”⁷⁷⁰³

The Commission’s report contained some examples of how the judiciary had aided apartheid:

- A. Prosecutors who knew that police interrogators had used brutal means to extract information from suspects, but still protected them from being questioned too closely on their methods.
- B. Attorneys-general who too easily launched prosecutions or granted ‘no-bail’ certificates on flimsy evidence.

⁷⁷⁰² Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 4, 1998: 107-108.

⁷⁷⁰³ Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 4, 1998: 101-102.

- C. Magistrates who uncritically granted police search and seizure warrants, and whose inquests conveniently found no one responsible for injuries and deaths in detention.
- D. Attorneys who failed to accept unpopular political persons as clients, perhaps for fear of social ostracism or the loss of lucrative commercial clients.
- E. Advocates who were willing to appear for the government in civil actions in which some of the basic building blocks of apartheid, such as racial classification, influx control or group areas, were being attacked as unreasonable and invalid exercises of executive discretion.
- F. Judges who, in the greatest injustices of all, too easily made sense of the illogical and the unjust in legislative language, and who too quickly accepted the word of the police or official witnesses in preference to that of the accused. Kathleen Satchwell in her submission dealt extensively with the case of her client Linda Mogale, who was assaulted and tortured in detention. Despite evidence to this effect, the judge nevertheless rejected “as impossible” the idea of a process of police violence and system of intimidation.⁷⁷⁰⁴

It seems improbable that Corbett was unaware of what was happening to the judiciary under apartheid, especially regarding the appointments and promotions of judges. Nevertheless, he took such a stance. Rather than being ignorant, it seems more likely that he was trying to protect the reputation of his professional community and of his former colleagues, after seeing how the reputations of other respected professional communities, for example the medical profession, had been shattered by the TRC’s exposure of their disgraceful conduct under apartheid.

Judge Corbett’s conduct during apartheid, when he served as a judge before he became a chief justice, could be characterised as disgraceful on at least two occasions when he disregarded international law and supported the apartheid government’s actions. Two Appellate Division rulings supported by Judge Corbett concerned provision of counsel for indigent accused and a State’s responsibility for its agents. In the first, the court rejected the right to counsel of accused people without assets, ignoring the stance of international and European human rights organisations that indigent accused were entitled to such representation. The second case concerned the abduction of persons from Swaziland by South African security forces. It was common practice at the time for South African security forces and agents to abduct anti-apartheid activists from foreign territory and bring them back to ⁷⁷⁰⁴ Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 4, 1998: 102-103.

South Africa for interrogation and torture in detention. However, unbelievably, the court, with the full support of Judge Corbett, ruled that the State bore no responsibility for the unauthorised acts of its agents, a decision which ran counter to international law.⁷⁷⁰⁵

In order to better understand the climate of the time, it should be noted that in 1996 one hundred White judges, including ten of the eleven on the Appeal Court (the exception was Justice Ralph Zulman),⁷⁷⁰⁶ most of them appointed by the apartheid government, came out against the nomination of Justice Ismail Mahomed and attempted to block his appointment as Chief Justice of South Africa, to succeed the retiring Corbett.⁷⁷⁰⁷ Justice Mahomed was the first Black judge to be appointed to the Supreme Court, and a member of the new Constitutional Court, and during his career had defended several leading figures in the anti-apartheid struggle. The White judges instead pushed for the nomination of Hennie van Heerden, a White judge and the most senior member of the Appeal Court. One of the most vocal opponents of Mahomed's appointment was Appeal Court Judge Joos Hefer – who, according to Advocate Clifford Mailer, had been “a champion of apartheid emergency legislation” in the late 1980s. Advocate Mailer accused the White judges of hypocrisy, reminding them that none of them had protested when “Mahomed had to finish his argument in one day at the Appeal Court in Bloemfontein, because if he stayed overnight he would break the Group Areas Act. Not a voice was raised in protest when the same apartheid laws prevented Mr Mahomed lunching with colleagues in the bar dining-room.”⁷⁷⁰⁸

Eventually, the White judges failed in their campaign and Nelson Mandela appointed Justice Mahomed as South Africa's Chief Justice. The New York Times characterised his appointment as “a momentous step towards transforming the country's justice system.”⁷⁷⁰⁹ Furthermore, the Pretoria Bar, which refused to admit Black members, only made an apology for its racism in October 1997.⁷⁷¹⁰

If Chief Justice Corbett had not spoken against Govender's suggestion and the TRC had investigated Tsafendas's case in 1996, the Commission would have discovered the plethora of evidence found by the author in the National Archives of South Africa and in Portugal. Just this would have been enough to reveal the truth about Tsafendas and the ⁷⁷⁰⁵ Dugard, 1998a: 118-120.

⁷⁷⁰⁶ Soggot (Mail and Guardian), 20 September 1996, ‘Battle lines drawn over chief justice.’

⁷⁷⁰⁷ Braid (The Independent), ‘SA old guard blocks black judge.’

⁷⁷⁰⁸ Braid (The Independent), ‘SA old guard blocks black judge.’

⁷⁷⁰⁹ Cauvin (The New York Times), 19 June 2000, ‘Ismail Mahomed, 68; Led post-apartheid court.’

⁷⁷¹⁰ Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Vol. 4, 1998: 101.

assassination. In addition, the TRC had the means and the authority to have investigated the case even further by interviewing people who knew Tsafendas. This would have provided additional information about him, since many witnesses who knew him well, and were then still alive, had died by the time the author began its research. Thus, if the case had been investigated by the TRC, the truth about Tsafendas and the assassination would have had come to light then and not twenty-one years later. In addition, Tsafendas would probably have been released from the hospital and would not have spent the last five years of his life alone there.

This author, along with Advocate George Bizos, Professor John Dugard, Mr. Krish Govender, Advocate Dumisa Ntsebeza and Justice Zak Yacoob, strongly believes that the current Minister of Justice should act upon the facts and evidence about Tsafendas's case, rather than ignoring them as Chief Justice Corbett did.

OPINIONS OF SOME PROMINENT ANTI-APARTHEID ACTIVISTS CONCERNING TSAFENDAS

Renowned historian and anti-apartheid activist Lulli Callinicos believes that the apartheid regime would never have revealed that Tsafendas was a committed Communist with a long history of political activism. She also gave the author another reason as to why the State would have wanted to portray Tsafendas as a madman:

“At the time (1966) things were hotting-up. The ANC and the PAC were banned, they had gone into exile, and they had also of course announced the armed struggle. They were actually scores of, in fact hundreds, going into exile to train for armed struggle. I think it was a serious threat if it was announced that a member of the Communist Party and of course a man of Colour [had assassinated Dr. Verwoerd]. [The apartheid authorities feared that] this might actually stimulate and mobilise more Blacks to raise up. That was something that was a very real possibility. So it had well suited them to define him as a crazed individual. It was a far better strategy than to find that he had tried to promote a revolution. That's why he was permanently silenced.”⁷⁷¹¹

Professor Renfrew Christie told the author:

⁷⁷¹¹ Luli Calinicos in a personal interview, 6 April 2015.

“I was in my final year of high school when Tsafendas carried out his political assassination of Verwoerd. My own view is that he was perfectly sane, he was, after all, a member of the South African Communist Party. My own interpretation of the events is that this was a fully legitimate, politically motivated part of the armed struggle. Remember, Nelson Mandela had been sentenced for armed struggle just two years before, two or three years and there was a legitimate armed struggle going on against one of the great evils of the Twentieth Century and the greatest architect was Hendrik Verwoerd. So, the person that killed Verwoerd was a member of the Communist Party, the South African Communist Party and, in alliance with the ANC, were in an armed struggle. I think his basic motives are perfectly obvious, he carried out an armed struggle and killed the tyrant and that is, I think, how he should be remembered, as a hero. I think it is very peculiar that the new South Africa has accepted the crooked old South Africa’s interpretation of Tsafendas.

In the time of reconciliation and settlement, I think a lot of the heroism of the armed struggle got whitewashed and papered over and forgotten. There’s a sustained pressure out of Western Europe, and even now, we get people who paint art works about the settlement and about Mandela the ‘peacemaker’ and we get people coming to stress how important was the non-violent struggle in liberating the country. And it sometimes has a Cold War flavour, that the ANC was aligned with the Communist Party and was supported by the Soviets whereas the West were not democrats in South Africa for forty years, the West fought against democracy for forty years. So, there’s an attempt to hide the armed struggle and to play up the side of Nelson Mandela, the ‘peacemaker’ rather than Nelson Mandela, the ‘armed struggler.’ In fact, and in the actual history, there was thirty years of armed struggle. The latter-day attempt to ignore it and to say we would have had a peaceful settlement anyway and capitalism would naturally have reformed, is a continuation of Cold War thinking. The fact remains that the West armed, even after sanctions, secretly armed apartheid and they did it, not only because they were racists, although there was deep racism in places like Brazil and America, they did it because they wanted forced labour for mining gold and diamonds and uranium.”⁷⁷¹²

Anti-apartheid revolutionary Lionel Davis was imprisoned for seven years on Robben Island (1964-1971) and then spent another five years under house arrest (1971-1976). He was in Robben Island prison when Tsafendas was taken there in November 1966. He told the author: “We saw him [Tsafendas] on Robben Island because he was in the main cell block that was opposite where we were. He was in a single cell there and we were in single cells on the other side.” Davis said that Tsafendas was “totally isolated,” in an area where those who were punished were kept. As to how Tsafendas was seen at the time by his fellow prisoners, he told the author, “We all saw him as a hero. He was a hero in our eyes.” Asked whether the ANC members also saw Tsafendas as a hero, Davis said, “All political, orchestrated political persuasions on the island, hailed him as a hero.” Davis also stated that all his former comrades in the anti-apartheid struggle “still hail him as a hero.”⁷⁷¹³

⁷⁷¹² Professor Renfrew Christie in a personal interview, 12 April 2016.

Denis Goldberg told the author that Tsafendas’s statements to the South African police after his arrest, “clearly shows that he was politically motivated [for killing Verwoerd] and not insane ... the man is determined to kill the Prime Minister because of the racism... [Tsafendas] has a clear political opinion about racism.” Goldberg was not in the least surprised when he heard that Tsafendas had been declared to be insane, and always had doubts about the verdict. He thought that it was natural for the Apartheid State to do such a thing so they could claim that “only an insane person would kill this brilliant prime minister.” “They would have never admitted that a Communist did it,” Goldberg told the author.⁷⁷¹⁴

Goldberg also believes that it would have been “very embarrassing” for the authorities and the police if it had become known that Tsafendas was a former member of the South African Communist Party and a committed Communist with a long history of political activism. “They had made a decision, they’re not going to have a proper trial, they want Tsafendas declared insane and unfit to stand and that was their decision. So, we lock him away until the Government says it’s okay to release him or never and the answer was never, until he died.” Asked by the author whether he agreed with Tsafendas’s act, Goldberg said that while he did not condone political assassinations, he could not condemn this one. About Tsafendas, he said, “I have no problem with him.”⁷⁷¹⁵

Krish Govender said that the “society should recognise the heroism of Tsafendas and his place in history should be in the category of a freedom fighter and he should be honoured.”⁷⁷¹⁶ Ronnie Kasrils characterised this study as “incredible” and said of Tsafendas that “the powers of the day sought to portray Tsafendas as a crazy man, and what we now can ⁷⁷¹³ Lionel Davis in a personal interview, 8 April 2015.

⁷⁷¹⁴ Denis Goldberg in a personal interview, 12 April 2016.

⁷⁷¹⁵ Denis Goldberg in a personal interview, 12 April 2016.

⁷⁷¹⁶ Sunday Times, 11 September 2016: 7, ‘Verwoerd’s killer a freedom fighter?’

see and the country needs to know is that the man was motivated with good intentions and that he was a communist.” Kasrils also said that Tsafendas should have been pardoned back in 1994, but instead “what we have is an invisible man. We have an unmarked grave at Sterkfontein... his name should be on the wall of Freedom Park.”⁷⁷¹⁷

Ahmed Kathrada, asked by the author whether he thought Dr Verwoerd’s assassination changed South Africa’s history and hastened the end of apartheid, said, “there is no doubt about that.” Asked whether he agreed with the assassination, he clarified that although he does not agree with assassinations in general, he cannot condemn this particular one.⁷⁷¹⁸ High Court Judge Jody Kollapen told the author that “the interesting thing is, that if he was found not to be insane then the trial would have to proceed, right. Then, there’s a real risk – given his early arrest for distributing pamphlets etc. – that you’re putting on trial, then, not only Dimitris Tsafendas, you’re putting on trial on the international stage the entire system of apartheid.”⁷⁷¹⁹

John Matshikiza, a prominent South African actor, poet and political activist, wrote shortly after Tsafendas’s funeral in an article in the Mail and Guardian that Verwoerd’s assassin was not only an “unsung hero” and South Africa’s “greatest political assassin,” but that he had secured “a place in heaven.” Matshikiza also stressed that Tsafendas never mentioned the tapeworm during his interrogation despite persistent efforts by the police to make him say a tapeworm made him do it. He concluded his article with the following, “Any warrior who would be prepared to strike a blow against it [apartheid] would be entitled to a place in heaven. For 33 years we ignored Tsafendas. He had embarrassed us by getting straight to the point, while we were still justifying our pain. Last Saturday, he was buried quietly in Krugersdorp. Ten people, mostly members of the Greek community were in attendance. The politicians, and the humble victims of apartheid for whom he had struck the most awesome blow in the fight for freedom, chose to stay away.”⁷⁷²⁰

Solly Mapaila, First Deputy General Secretary of the South African Communist Party told the author:

“The majority of our people in the country have relied, not exclusively but in the main, on the information from the apartheid treaty about Tsafendas, which sought to deal

⁷⁷¹⁷ Sunday Times, 11 September 2016: 7, ‘Verwoerd’s killer a freedom fighter?’

⁷⁷¹⁸ Ahmed Kathrada in a personal interview, 13 April 2016.

⁷⁷¹⁹ Judge Jody Kollapen in a personal interview, 16 April 2015.

⁷⁷²⁰ Matshikiza (Mail and Guardian), October 15 to 21, 1999: 4, ‘Place in heaven for unsung hero.’

away with the discourse that the liberation movement or the political actors at the time, whether on behalf of the liberation movement or on behalf of their own conscience could actually take political action against the apartheid treaty. Which is what Tsafendas did. So, they did not want to create an impression that somebody can respond to the might of oppression and Tsafendas, not only responded to this might, he hit them hard. He hit the main force, the principal force and the principal instigator of the apartheid system.

So, with that he was politically astute and correct in the actual identifying the real problem and he decided to sort it out the best way he could and I think any other Black person who has political conscience with that access could have actually done it, knowing that he will pay the ultimate price for it and I'm quite convinced that Tsafendas had a clear conscience that he will die on the side of the people by his actions and he was brave enough. In fact, I regard him as a hero and a warrior for his bravery to confront the might of apartheid systems, right in its parliament and actually dealt with Verwoerd. So, the apartheid regime created this impression that this was a lunatic, a madman, who one day decided to kill the Prime Minister of the country at the time, not knowing what he was doing because he was a lunatic. Obviously only fools really believe this stupid idea throughout history."

Mapaila concluded that the truth about Tsafendas was "long overdue" and that South Africa and the Communist Party should "recognise the contribution of Dimitri Tsafendas and to accord him, his rightful place amongst heroes of our struggle."⁷⁷²¹

Alexander Moumbaris, who was honoured twice by the South African government (Grand Companion of O.R. Tambo and a Sabotage Campaign medal) for his part in the struggle against apartheid. Moumbaris considers Tsafendas to be the most unfairly treated person in the history of South Africa. He is deeply saddened that Tsafendas suffered a lonely death in a psychiatric hospital. In 2003, he created a web page for Tsafendas headed, "Dimitri Tsafendas. Remembering a Revolutionary. Homage to Dimitri Tsafendas. Hero and Martyr of the Cause of the South African People." Moumbaris concluded his entry with the following: "I regret not having done better for him to get out of there [the hospital where he died]. He deserved a better liberty than the one he got."⁷⁷²² He described Tsafendas to the author as "a brave revolutionary, the bravest man I ever met." He believes that South Africa should at last ⁷⁷²¹ Solly Mapaila in a personal interview, 24 March 2015.

⁷⁷²² <https://archive.is/pYjSu#selection-205.0-205.110>

recognise that Tsafendas was a revolutionary, not an insane person, and that the assassination was a political act and not a mindless one.⁷⁷²³

Helen Suzman, asked by Liza Key if the assassination changed South Africa's history, she replied:

“I do think the assassination of Verwoerd changed the course of history in South Africa, because nobody was quite as sure as he was of the policy of separate development. I mean, he was steeped in it. It was religion to him. But the others all had doubts. I mean there was no doubt that Vorster was determined to maintain white domination, but that was a different thing. It wasn't based in any philosophy the way Verwoerd's was. Nobody had the same certitude that he had. And I am quite sure that the first brick would not have come down in the late seventies with the removal of job reservations and the granting of Trade Union rights to Blacks. Now those were the removal of the first bricks of apartheid. He [Dr. Verwoerd] would have known, and he would have been right from the point of view of his reasoning, that if you start pulling down one or two bricks in the wall of apartheid, the whole structure would eventually come tumbling down as indeed it did.”⁷⁷²⁴

Asked by Liza Key what she thought would have happened if Dr. Verwoerd had not died, Suzman said:

“I think we would have ended up with a civil war. I think South Africa would gone on being a Pariah nation, the other countries would have intensified the economic boycott and sanctions. And eventually, the Black people would have been supplied either by Russia or some other country with sufficient arms to enable them to actually start a civil war which would have been pretty horrific. And not easily, I don't think brought to a victorious conclusion.”⁷⁷²⁵

⁷⁷²³ Alexander Moumbaris in a personal interview, 11 May 2016.

⁷⁷²⁴ Helen Suzman in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997.

⁷⁷²⁵ Helen Suzman in Liza Key's A Question of Madness, 1997.

CONCLUSION

Dimitris Tsafendas was a man of deep political convictions, a passionate Communist from his teenage years, inspired by his anarchist father. He was kind-hearted, generous and selfless. Always poor, he repeatedly gave money to people he felt needed it more than he did, such as his flatmate Jacobus Bornman, paupers in Durban, a poor woman in Istanbul, passengers lacking a bus fare. He devoted hours of his time to teaching children without payment in Mozambique and Turkey. He had a keen eye for injustice. Born in Mozambique, he saw no reason why this African nation should remain in the control of Portugal, a European power, and at great cost to himself, he campaigned persistently for its independence. What he envisaged was “a Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they white or black, and therefore separated from the mother nation.”⁷⁷²⁶

Tsafendas never made no attempt to disguise his beliefs and for his pains he was dismissed from jobs and forced into exile. The PIDE became aware of Tsafendas’s political activities in 1935, when he was seventeen, when he was dismissed from his work for “voicing Communist ideas.”⁷⁷²⁷ Three years later after he was “suspected of distributing communist propaganda,” PIDE opened a file on him, the Secret Criminal Record n° 10.415 of Demitrios Tsafantakis.⁷⁷²⁸ The file only got bigger over the years and at the time of the assassination, almost thirty years later, it ran to 130 pages.

Injustice for Tsafendas was never more evident than in South Africa, where apartheid ruled. It was a policy which Tsafendas loathed as racist and exploitative, and he was willing to do “anything that would get the South African regime out of power.”⁷⁷²⁹ He joined the South African Communist Party and worked actively on its behalf; in London, he participated in anti-apartheid and anti-colonial demonstrations; he smuggled anti-apartheid literature into South Africa and he urged visitors to spend as little as possible in order not to contribute to the apartheid economy. Finally, he assassinated Dr. Verwoerd, the man he characterised as the brains behind apartheid, hoping that with the guiding hand gone, apartheid would collapse

⁷⁷²⁶ PIDE Record of questions, 25 November 1964. SR. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁷²⁷ Confidential Report of the Police Body of the Province of Mozambique regarding Demetrio Tsafendas. No: 726/694/PI, 3 May 1955. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁷²⁸ Secret Criminal Record n° 10.415 of Demitrios Tsafantakis. PIDE/DGS, SC, CI (2) 6818, NT 7461, PNA. ANTT.

⁷⁷²⁹ Edward Charles Furness statement to the police, 12 October 1966. K150, Vol. 12, File: Verklarings Demitrio Tsafendas, SANA.

and a more benign national policy would take its place; and that is exactly what he told the police after the assassination.

Tsafendas was held in custody for twenty days before being allowed access to his lawyers. While in the hands of the police, he was systematically beaten, given electric shocks and subjected to mock hangings, a brutal range of physical and psychological tortures commonly practised against political prisoners by the apartheid police. Tsafendas asked to be defended by Advocate George Bizos, whose father he knew well, but his request was ignored. Instead the State chose who would defend him. However, it should be stated that the lawyers in question were quite independent and unconnected with the authorities.

Although Tsafendas had given the police logical and valid political reasons for the killing, twenty days later, when he met his defence team, he changed his tune. He claimed that a tapeworm lived inside him which controlled his life. He repeated this to the doctors who examined him later. After nearly three weeks of systematic brutality and cognisant of the fate of many political prisoners under apartheid, Tsafendas concluded that what lay ahead of him was a dubious and undignified death in a police cell. Determined to avoid such an inglorious end and to stop the torture, Tsafendas resorted to a strategy he had used in the past to get out of trouble, namely, pretending to be mad. It had worked when he was arrested by the American immigration authorities, on two occasions when he was detained by the Portuguese police, once to avoid service in the Portuguese army and once to persuade the Portuguese to give him amnesty to return to Mozambique after twelve years in exile.

Tsafendas's defence team prepared an excellent case, lining up psychiatrists who had examined him and witnesses who had had contact with him. However, the psychiatrists based their findings only on what they were told by Tsafendas himself and were forced to take short-cuts due to the pressure of time. The result was a misdiagnosis of Tsafendas, with the eager co-operation of the accused. The psychiatrists became convinced that Tsafendas was a schizophrenic after examinations whose circumstances would normally raise legal eyebrows. None of the psychiatrists' diagnoses would have been seen as credible in any democratic court today.

As for the witnesses chosen to testify for Tsafendas, most hardly knew him, except for the O'Ryans and, to a certain extent, the Daniels. Meanwhile people who had known him for many years, even a lifetime, were ignored by the defence. A good example was James Johnston, who told the police that he did not know Tsafendas well and had talked to him for twenty minutes in his whole life. Yet he was called to testify for the defence. That said, the rationale for the defence choices was evident: put on the stand witnesses who could support its chosen line, not necessarily those who knew the accused best. What was surprising was that the credibility of Johnston and the other witnesses was not questioned by the State. The prosecutors could quickly have challenged the right of certain witnesses to testify and broken down their claims, but this did not happen. Peter Daniels clearly lied and gave testimony to the police that flatly contradicted that of his sister. The State could easily have exposed his testimony, but it did not attempt to do so.

The defence's main witness was Patrick O'Ryan, Tsafendas's best friend and someone who knew him extremely well. In normal proceedings, he would have been the only suitable witness to take the stand. O'Ryan spoke at length about the tapeworm, although he had said nothing to the police about such a creature, and had also stated that Tsafendas was perfectly sane. Many years later, O'Ryan confessed that he had lied about the tapeworm at the urging of Wilfrid Cooper, Tsafendas's advocate. He said he knew perfectly well that Tsafendas did not have a tapeworm and that it was an invention from his past to convince the Portuguese police to stop torturing him. In his statements to the police, Tsafendas made no mention of a tapeworm and gave clear political reasons for killing Dr. Verwoerd. However, what Tsafendas told the police was not used in court and the defence's claims of schizophrenia and a tapeworm went unchallenged.

Tsafendas's summary trial was in fact a show trial. The police had enough evidence to destroy the defence's line. Although the author is not in position to know whether this evidence was passed to the Attorney-General, the latter's conduct during the proceedings was strange, to say the least. Suspicions as to his integrity were heightened ten days after the trial when he denied knowing that Tsafendas was a former member of the South African Communist Party. This fact became known to him at least twenty-seven days earlier and, of course, during the summary trial. The defence case looked solid, but it would have been no match for the State if the prosecutor had used all the evidence gathered by the police. None of Tsafendas's political ideas or activities was spoken of in court and the word "Communist" was never heard. Instead, Tsafendas was presented as a schizophrenic, withdrawn, isolated, rude, a drifter, uninterested in politics, a person who lived an aimless life often taking advantage of other people. The considerable evidence suggesting that the truth was the exact opposite did not appear. The conclusion must be that either the Attorney-General chose not to use this evidence or it was not in his possession.

Doctors who examined Tsafendas gave a list of what they said were his schizophrenic symptoms, including being withdrawn, isolated, unable to function on a reasonable level, unable to follow a conversation after fifteen minutes, unable to look after himself, speaking in a disjointed manner, a victim of thought-disorder and confused ideas. The police and the Commission interviewed two hundred people and none of them noticed any of these symptoms in Tsafendas. The author interviewed forty-four people who knew Tsafendas well, some of them since childhood. Not one perceived any of these alleged symptoms and all strongly disagreed that Tsafendas was anything like the doctors' characterisation. Tsafendas's alleged belief that he had a tapeworm is as much a myth as Mamoru Samuragochi's deafness.

Although the author cannot know if the Attorney General had access to the police evidence and chose not to use it or whether the evidence was withheld from him, the same cannot be said for the Commission of Enquiry. The police provided the Commission with most, if not all, of the evidence they had assembled. More importantly, the Commission had conducted its own investigation and had discovered enough evidence to show that Tsafendas was not as portrayed in court. In the event, the Commission concealed very important evidence and presented Tsafendas in almost the same way he was portrayed at the summary trial. Although the Commission was well aware of Tsafendas's real personality, his political activities and the real reasons why he killed Dr. Verwoerd, it deliberately concealed these facts so as not to contradict what was heard in court. It is clear from the way its Report is written that the Commission wanted to belittle Tsafendas so that no-one would feel any sympathy for him, but also so that no-one would ever think that the pathetic man presented in its Report could have had a political motive for assassinating Dr. Verwoerd.

The Commission acted shamelessly and in a scandalous way in concealing many of Tsafendas's political activities, but more importantly for distorting his intentions in killing Dr. Verwoerd. Tsafendas had told the police openly that he killed the prime minister because he considered him not to be the real representative of all South Africans, that he was disgusted by his racial policies and he hoped that by killing him a change of policy would take place. None of these altruistic motives was mentioned by the Commission. Instead it speculated pointlessly about what his motive might have been and what might have triggered his hand.

Furthermore, the Commission dealt extensively with the question of Dr. Verwoerd's death being discussed on board the Eleni three days before he actually died. Although at least six witnesses from the Eleni had told the police that Tsafendas had spoken of a hypothetical assassination of Dr. Verwoerd as being morally justifiable because he was a tyrant, the Commission concealed this information, too, and again it speculated about what might have happened. In smearing Tsafendas, the Commission used unfounded characterizations and misrepresented some incidents. At the same time, it omitted some 90% of the positive statements about Tsafendas's character and mental state, while including almost every negative one.

PIDE contributed to the misrepresentation of Tsafendas by concealing from the South African police the fact that it had a file on Tsafendas. The file contained, in PIDE's words, "information indicating Tsafendas as a partisan for the independence of Mozambique." Thus, the South African authorities never learned of the extent of Tsafendas's political activities in Mozambique. Nevertheless, the South African police managed to discover a great deal about Tsafendas's political activities not only in Mozambique but in other nations where he travelled. The most important of these were also concealed from the public.

The South African police, PIDE, the Attorney-General and the Commission each played a role in presenting a distorted picture of Tsafendas by concealing evidence. The Commission's Report, although no more subjective and honest than that of the Sharpeville Commission, was accepted without question because it sounded so convincing. For fifty years it remained unchallenged. The fact is it was a character assassination and a travesty of truth. The same may be said about Tsafendas's summary trial, although the judge was innocent of any malfeasance, being unaware of much important evidence. However, the Attorney-General, the supposed custodian of evidence, failed to present significant testimony and thus another travesty of truth took place.

With regard to Dr. Verwoerd, Professor John Dugard, who has served as a judge at the International Court of Justice (ICJ), told the author that if he was alive today, he could have been charged by the ICJ with "committing a crime against humanity, namely the propagation of apartheid." "He would have been accused of committing a crime against humanity, because in 1973, the United Nations promoted the UN Convention on the Prohibition of the Crime of Apartheid. So apartheid was defined as a crime against humanity in 1973. And clearly, Dr. Verwoerd, as the main architect of apartheid, would have been categorised as a criminal. So if he had been brought before the court, he would have been charged with a crime against humanity.” However, the decision to prosecute him would have been political and it is by no means certain that he would ever have been placed in the dock.⁷⁷³⁰

A profound irony concerning the attacks on Dr. Verwoerd is that Tsafendas and Pratt have always been regarded as mad, while Dr. Verwoerd is considered to be sane. Let us examine the achievements and beliefs of these three historic characters in the table below:

VERWOERD	TSAFENDAS	PRATT
He believed that his life was saved by divine intervention, thus proving that God accepted apartheid and wished it to continue. He told Canadian Prime Minister John Diefenbaker that his survival “revealed God’s approval of the cause he had followed.” He also told his wife, “I knew that I had been spared to complete my life’s work.”	He had no such thoughts.	He had no such thoughts.
He believed in minority rule and claimed that this was the only way for the minority to be protected against the majority. He argued that “apartheid is based on the principle that only in this way	He believed in majority rule.	He believed in majority rule.

⁷⁷³⁰ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 7 February 2016.

can the weak he protected from the strong, and the minority be made to feel safe.”
He believed that each race should be separate and should “develop” on its own. Such development was difficult for the 79% of the population who had no land rights, were forced to live in designated areas and were forbidden to enter “Whites only” territory. The Whites were 21% of the population but owned 87% of the land, forcing the 79% who were not White onto the remaining 13%.	He believed all people to be equal and that they should have equal rights.	He believed all people to be equal and that they should have equal rights.
He prohibited mixed marriages in order to preserve the White race. “I will not be responsible for the bastardization of the Afrikaner people,” he told his wife.	He believed all races were equal and people should be allowed to marry whoever they wanted. He had, Black, White, Jewish, Muslim and Christian girlfriends.	He believed that all people are the same and should be allowed to marry whoever they wanted.
He believed that only Whites should decide the country’s policies and future, although they were a distinct minority in terms of numbers, because	He believed that all the people of South Africa should decide their policies and future. He wanted “a government representing all	He believed that all people of South Africa should decide their policies and their future. “... Every South African, Afrikaner,

the non-Whites were not civilized, and that he and the other Whites were going to “civilize” them, “protect” them, “help” them and “teach” them “democracy.”	the South African people,” and he did not consider that Dr. Verwoerd represented all the people. He believed that Mozambique should be “governed by the natives of that Province, be they White or Black, and therefore separated from the mother nation.” He cherished the hope that one day the South African people would storm Parliament and throw out the apartheid government.	English South African, Coloured, Indian, Bantu, Malay... every person in South Arica has got to play his part if we are to build the South African that I know can be built...”
He created the Bantu Education Act which was designed to teach the Blacks that they were not the same as Whites, that they would never have equal rights but would be the “labourer in the country.” Most importantly, the Act would prevent them from learning about “European values” such as “freedom” and “equality.”	He believed that education was one of the most important things in life. He voluntarily taught for free English and History to Greek, Mozambican and Turkish children in Mozambique and in Turkey.	He believed that education was one of the most important things in life. He financed and built a modern school on his farm for his Black workers’ children, which still exists today.
He forcibly removed hundreds of thousands of non-Whites so that they could not live among White people, seizing the land thus made	He considered Mozambique, Rhodesia and South Africa to be “occupied lands,” stolen by force from the indigenous inhabitants and ruled by	He built modern and comfortable apartments in his farm for his Black employees. Their relatives and friends came to live

vacant for occupation by Whites.	colonialists and fascists. He recognised the rights of Whites to live there if they accepted majority rule and did not exploit the non-Whites. He had also lived in houses with Blacks, Coloureds and Whites.	there, too, and were allowed to do so.
He espoused a form of neo-slavery, requiring that non-Whites learn only how to serve the White man, teaching them that they were “not allowed to gaze” at “the green pastures of European society,” and that there was “no place for them in the European community above the level of certain forms of labour.”	He organized strikes and attempted to organize employees in places where he worked to act for their rights.	He was such a good employer that friends and relatives of his Black employees flocked to him, asking for work.
Although Africans lived in South Africa for more than 200,000 years in comparison to the 400 years of the Whites, he believed that South Africa was a white country because Whites developed and “civilized” it. He presented South Africa as a land that had been empty before the Europeans arrived.	He wanted “a Mozambique governed by the natives of that Province, be they White or Black, and therefore separated from the mother-nation.” In South Africa, he wanted “a government representing all the South African people.”	He believed that all people of South Africa should have a say in deciding the future of their country. “... Every South African, Afrikaner, English South African, Coloured, Indian, Bantu, Malay... every person in South Arica has got to play his part if we are to build

		the South African that I know can be built...”
He was pro-Nazi and anti-Semitic. He copied some of the Nuremberg Laws. He supported the Nazis during WWII and was convicted for being a “tool of the Nazis.”	He was anti-Nazi and anti-fascist. He got into physical fights with members of the Ossewabrandwag in South Africa and with Oswald Mosley’s fascists in England. He served on American ships supplying the Allies in WWII. He fought with the Communists against the Royalists in the Greek Civil War.	He was anti-apartheid, anti-fascist and anti-Nazi. He joined the South African army as a volunteer in WWII.
He believed apartheid was God’s will and that He approved it.	He believed that the Churches should be on the side of the people and not with the establishment.	He believed “a glittering future awaited South Africa as long as she observes the basic laws of God and human dignity, which of course, means, in the words, I think, of Macmillan at the time, “Rule by merit and not pigment of skin.”
He believed that Africans should be grateful that the Europeans did not annihilate them when they first arrived in South Africa, as the Europeans did to the Indians in the USA.	-	-

He turned South Africa into a police state in order to suppress opposition, using methods ranging from banning and exile to imprisonment and torture.	He tried to end apartheid. He was arrested five times by the Portuguese for anti-colonialist activities. PIDE had a file on him since he was twenty. He participated in anti-apartheid and anti-fascist demonstrations. He urged people to boycott South African goods.	He wanted apartheid to end and Dr. Verwoerd to reconsider his policies. He publicly spoke out in Britain in favour of a boycott of South African imports.
He was racist. He considered Africans to be “lower than animals.” He strongly believed that the Afrikaners were South Africa’s master race, destined for supremacy, while other races were “privileged” to share South Africa with them, but in an inferior position. In a debate in Parliament, apparently amazed, he told an MP “... and you believe a Native instead of my word!”	He was fanatically anti-racist and believed that all people are equal. He was member of the anti-fascist movement, the Yellow Star.	He was a committed anti-racist believing all people to be equal. He helped several non-Whites in South Africa with gifts of money.
He believed that he was always right and that people outside South had misunderstood apartheid. He insisted that apartheid was a “domestic affair” and people	He understood perfectly well what apartheid was and wanted it to end.	He understood perfectly well what apartheid was and wanted it to end.

who did not live in South Africa could not understand its nature and its background.
He insisted that “a vast number” of non-Whites in South Africa approved his policies, while the rest simply failed to understand that apartheid was really something good and that he was trying to do what was best for them	He understood perfectly well what apartheid was and wanted it to end.	He understood perfectly well what apartheid was and wanted it to end.
He was the “architect of apartheid.”	He considered Dr. Verwoerd to be the brains behind apartheid and hoped that by killing him, a “change of policy would take place.” He joined the British anti-apartheid movement, he was a member of the SACP and he participated in anti-apartheid demonstrations.	He wanted to end apartheid. He tried to form a political coalition with the aim of defeating the National Party at the polls and ending apartheid. He gave financial assistance to the anti-apartheid Liberal Party of Great Britain and often spoke publicly in England against apartheid.

By today’s standards, which of these two men’s opinions and actions would suggest insanity? They were different times, in a nation more God-fearing than most today, but it was the same era and the same nation for both men. It might be germane to add here that another apartheid enthusiast, General van den Bergh also believed, like Dr. Verwoerd, that his life was saved by divine intervention. He declared that “the hand of God was upon me” when a lightning strike killed a nearby African during a storm but left him untouched. However, no-one seems to have questioned van den Bergh's sanity, apart from the British writer Frederick Forsyth, to whom he told the story.

Professor John Dugard said about the Tsafendas case and this research:

“Many South Africans suspected that there was a political cover-up in the Tsafendas case. The apartheid regime had two reasons for portraying Tsafendas to be insane. First, the regime wished to suggest that no-one in his right mind could kill such a wonderful leader as Hendrik Verwoerd. Secondly, there was the security aspect. The security apparatus, led by the Minister of Justice and Police, John Vorster, wished to avoid accountability for allowing a political revolutionary to be employed in a position close to the Prime Minister. So it was that the media and the legal proceedings were manipulated to present Tsafendas as a mentally deranged person dictated to by a tapeworm.

This research confirms that there was a cover-up. It shows convincingly that Tsafendas was a political revolutionary, whose assassination of Dr. Verwoerd was motivated by a hatred of Dr. Verwoerd and all he stood for. He was not an insane killer but a political assassin determined to rid South Africa of the architect of apartheid. Political assassinations seldom achieve their goal and this was no exception. But at least South African history should know the truth about Tsafendas. Dousemetzis has done South Africa a service by correcting the historical record.”⁷⁷³¹

Justice Zak Yacoob said about the study:

“The historical record shows that comrade Tsafendas killed Verwoerd, that he pleaded in sanity at the trial, his plea was upheld and he was, consequent to his plea confined at the pleasure of the relevant authority. If he had spoken the truth, he would have been sentenced to death, so the tactic was a very good one in the circumstances. History does not record that he pretended to be insane to save his life. This is well brought out in the research. The research shows conclusively that he did a deliberate courageous anti-apartheid act but pretended insanity at the trial understandably so. I think the research speaks for itself.”⁷⁷³²

Bertolt Brecht, one of Tsafendas's favourite authors, wrote something that fits perfectly both with his crime and with Dr Verwoerd's policies: “There are many ways to kill. One can stab a knife into someone's belly, take away one's bread, not heal one from a ⁷⁷³¹ Professor John Dugard in a personal interview, 8 September 2016.

⁷⁷³² Justice Zak Yacoob in a personal interview, 18 September 2017.

disease, stick one in a bad apartment, work one to death, drive one to commit suicide, send one off to war, etc. Only a few of these things are forbidden in our country.”⁷⁷³³

Unfortunately for Tsafendas, he chose the only one in the list that was forbidden by the apartheid system; all the rest were the results of Dr Verwoerd’s laws and policies.

⁷⁷³³ Brecht, B. (2016) Me Ti: Book of Interventions in the Flow of Things. Originally published in 1967 in German with the title Me Ti. Buch der Wendungen.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

PRIMARY SOURCES

ARCHIVAL MATERIALS

Attempted Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd. DO 35/10569. British National Archives.

Correctional Services File 80/0043, A 123, of Dimitrio Tsafendas. National Archives of South Africa.

David Pratt's file at the National Liberal Club Archives. London, England.

Dimitrio Tsafendas Mediese Leer A124 and A125. National Archives of South Africa.

Demitrios Tsafantakis's file in Arquivo PIDE/DGS (physical location: PIDE/DGS, SC, CI(2) 6818, NT 7461). Arquivo Nacional da Torre do Tombo. Lisbon, Portugal.

Demitrios Tsafantakis's file in Arquivo Antonio Oliveira Salazar (physical location: Arquivo Salazar, UL-46, cx. 843, pt.11). Arquivo Nacional da Torre do Tombo. Lisbon, Portugal.

Helen Suzman Papers 1944-2009. Mb2.10.1.5. University of the Witwatersrand.

K150. Report of the Commission of Enquiry into the Circumstances of the Death of the Late Dr. the Honourable Hendrik Frensch Verwoerd. National Archives of South Africa.

Mary Lindsay Cumming vs. David Beresford Pratt. 877/1953. National Archives of South Africa.

Regina vs. David Beresford Pratt. The State vs. David Beresford Pratt. 712-60. National Archives of South Africa.

Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Responsibility of Mentally Deranged Persons and Related Matters. National Archives of South Africa.

South Africa. Assassination of Dr. Verwoerd, Prime Minister of South Africa. PREM 13/1211. British National Archives.

Susan Diane Pratt. 6000/60. National Archives of South Africa.

Tsafendas's file in the Lawyers for Human Rights Collection (AL3183). South African History Archive.

INTERVIEWSWitnesses who met Tsafendas

Pamela Abrahams. She met Tsafendas in 1966 in Cape Town.

Cleanthes Alachiotis. From the Eleni, he associated a lot with Tsafendas during the Eleni's stay in Cape Town in July and August 1966.

George Ananiades. He met Tsafendas in 1963 in Lourenço Marques.

Pantelis Aspiotis. From the Eleni, he met Tsafendas in Cape Town in 1966.

Ilias Aspras. From the Eleni, he associated a lot with Tsafendas during the tanker's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Nick Augustides. Tsafendas's employer in July-September 1966.

Andreas Babiolakis. Grew up with Tsafendas in Mozambique and was a very close friend.

Nicola Banovic. A Greek Orthodox priest who became very close to Tsafendas. They met in Istanbul in 1961. Tsafendas lived in Father Banovic's house for four months and associated with him for another three.

David Beresford. Guardian journalist. He met Tsafendas in the mid-1990s in Sterkfontein hospital and wrote about him.

Nikolas Billis. From the Eleni, he associated a great deal with Tsafendas during the Eleni's stay in Cape Town in July and August 1966.

David Bloomberg. Tsafendas's attorney in the summary trial.

Willie Burger. Tsafendas's lawyer at his summary trial.

Costas Chagios. He associated with Tsafendas for about two years (1965-66) in Cape Town.

Professor Renfrew Christie. Anti-apartheid activist. He met Tsafendas in Pretoria Prison in 1980-1981, where he was also imprisoned.

Father Minas Constandinou. A Greek Orthodox priest who met Tsafendas in Mozambique in 1963. He later visited him in prison and in the hospital. They were extremely close and Tsafendas confided in him at length about his life.

Elias Constantaras. He associated with Tsafendas in Cape Town for several months in 1966.

Maggie Davey. She met Tsafendas in the mid-1990s in Sterkfontein hospital.

Joyce Dick. Helen Daniels's best friend. She met Tsafendas in 1965 in Cape Town.

Mary Eendracht. Tsafendas's cousin, grew up together in Egypt and Mozambique and were very close.

Efthimios Eleftheriadis. Priest who met Tsafendas in Hamburg in the 1950s.

John Galanakis. He met Tsafendas in Beira in 1964.

Fotini Gavasiadis. One of Tsafendas's closest friends. She met him in Pretoria in 1963-64. She saw Tsafendas virtually every day for nine months in 1963-4, when they were flatmates and then neighbours while they also worked together.

Helen Grispos. She grew up with Tsafendas in Mozambique and met him again in Rhodesia in 1964. Her husband George Grispos was one of Tsafendas's best childhood friends. Her mother Sophia Gavadias was Tsafendas's step-mother's best friend in Lourenço Marques.

Miltiades Kaldis. He met Tsafendas in Cape Town in 1965-1966.

Nicolas Kambouris. From the Eleni, he associated a lot with Tsafendas during the Eleni's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Georgios Kantas. From the Eleni, he consorted regularly with Tsafendas during the Eleni's stay in Cape Town in July and August 1966.

Liza Key. Filmmaker and researcher. She met Tsafendas in Sterkfontein Hospital in 1995 and subsequently visited him on several occasions. She made a documentary about him.

Judge Jody Kollapen. Anti-apartheid activist and High Court Judge in Pretoria. He met Tsafendas in prison in 1994 and tried to grant him an amnesty.

Ira Kyriakakis. She grew up with Tsafendas in Mozambique and was a very close friend.

Dionisis Lallis. From the Eleni, he met Tsafendas in July-August 1966.

George Liberopoulos. He met Tsafendas in Lourenço Marques in 1963.

James Mange. He met Tsafendas in prison in the early 1980s.

Manolis Mastromanolis. From the Eleni, he associated a lot with Tsafendas during the Eleni's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Antony Michaletos. Tsafendas's cousin and son of Artemis Michaletos, Tsafendas's aunt and his father's sister who brought him up in Egypt. He first met Tsafendas in 1951 in Lourenço Marques and got to know him well between 1963 and 1965 in Mozambique.

Irene Michaletos. She very closely associated with Tsafendas in Beira in 1964-1965.

John Michaletos. Tsafendas's cousin and son of Artemis Michaletos, Tsafendas's aunt and his father's sister who brought him up in Egypt. He first met Tsafendas in 1951 in Lourenço Marques and got to know him between 1963 and 1965 in Mozambique.

Alexander Moumbaris. Anti-apartheid revolutionary, MK fighter and fellow prisoner in Pretoria Prison. He met Tsafendas there and later visited him at Sterkfontein Hospital.

Marie-Jose Moumbaris. Anti-apartheid activist. She met Tsafendas in 1996 at Sterkfontein Hospital.

Antonis Nichas. He associated with Tsafendas in Cape Town in 1966.

Jerome O’Ryan. Son of Patrick O’Ryan. He lived under the same roof as Tsafendas for five months in 1965.

Reuben O’Ryan. Son of Patrick O’Ryan. He lived in the same house as Tsafendas for five months in 1965.

Stanley O’Ryan. Son of Patrick O’Ryan. He lived in the same house as Tsafendas for five months in 1965.

Nick Papadakis. He met Tsafendas in 1964 in Beira. They became good friends and they were also flatmates for two months.

George Petrakakis. He met Tsafendas in 1963 in Lourenço Marques.

Panagiotis Peroglou. He associated with Tsafendas in Cape Town in 1965-1966.

Vasilios Perselis. From the Eleni, he associated with Tsafendas during the tanker’s stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Richard Poggenpoel. Tsafendas lived in his house in Cape Town in 1965.

Katerina Pnema. Tsafendas’s half-sister.

Michael Pnema. Tsafendas’s nephew. He met him in 1964.

Costas Poriadis. He met Tsafendas in 1965 in Beira.

Grigoris Pouftis. From the Eleni, he associated a lot with Tsafendas during the tanker’s stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Peter Protoulis. He met Tsafendas in Cape Town in 1966.

Father Spiros Randos. A Greek Orthodox priest who visited Tsafendas in Pretoria Prison Hospital and in Sterkfontein Hospital and became close to him.

Dr. Isaac Sakinofsky. One of the psychiatrists who examined Tsafendas for the summary trial.

Dimitris Skoularikis. He met Tsafendas in prison in the early 1990s.

Ioannis Speis. From the Eleni, he met Tsafendas during the tanker's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Dimitris Stavrianos. From the Eleni, he met Tsafendas during the tanker's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Emmanuel Tsabouniaris. From the Eleni, he associated with Tsafendas during the tanker's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Bishop Ioannis Tsafaridis. The Bishop of the Greek Orthodox Church in Zambia-Malawi. He visited Tsafendas at Pretoria Prison Hospital and at Sterkfontein Hospital. Tsafendas told him much about his life.

Marina Tsihlakis. She met Tsafendas in Beira in 1964.

Evangelos Tsouroulis. President of the Greek Community in Rhodesia in 1964 and of the Pan-Hellenic Association of Zimbabwe-Zambia-Malawi-Mozambique Greek Communities (PAZZIMMO). He met Tsafendas in Rhodesia in 1964.

Reyner van Zyl. The psychologist who examined Tsafendas for the summary trial.

Stratis Vamvarapis. He met Tsafendas in 1965-1966 in Cape Town.

Alexandra Vaporidis. She met Tsafendas in 1961 in Istanbul. Her husband, Father Agathagos Vaporidis, was very good friend of Tsafendas.

Michalis Vasilakis. From the Eleni, he associated a lot with Tsafendas during the tanker's stay in Cape Town in July-August 1966.

Father Michalis Visvinis. A Greek Orthodox priest who very regularly visited Tsafendas in prison for five years (1989-1994). They became very close and Tsafendas spoke extensively to him about his life.

Michael Vlachopoulos. Tsafendas's nephew. He met him in 1963.

Gordon Winter. Former BOSS agent. He met Tsafendas in Pretoria Prison in 1975.

Periklis Zouridis. He met Tsafendas in 1964 in Beira.

Witnesses who did not meet Tsafendas

Akis Apergis. Member of the Greek community in Johannesburg at the time of the assassination.

Terry Bell. Anti-apartheid activist and journalist who co-authored the Unfinished Business: South Africa, Apartheid and Truth.

Ioannis Bizos. Member of the Greek Community in Johannesburg at the time of the assassination.

Advocate George Bizos. Human rights lawyer and anti-apartheid activist. His mother-in-law was one of the closest friends of Tsafendas's stepmother. Tsafendas requested to be represented by him, but his request was denied.

Desmond Blow. Rand Daily Mail, Sunday Times and Sunday Express journalist. He became very close to David Pratt after the latter's assault on Dr. Verwoerd.

Elizabeth Blow. Desmond's wife. She spoke to the author about her husband's relationship with Pratt.

Graham David Blow. Desmond Blow's son. He spoke to the author about his father's relationship with Pratt. He was named David by his father after Pratt.

Professor Alban Burke. Professor of Psychology and Head of the Psychology Department at the University of Johannesburg.

Stefan Bubenzer. Actor. He played in Will Tunner's play Tsafendas when it was performed in London in the 1970s.

Lulli Callinicos. Historian and anti-apartheid activist, present in Johannesburg at the time of the assassination.

Dr. Antonis Chaldeos. Historian, expert on Greek diaspora in Africa.

Gavin Cooper. Son of Wilfrid Cooper, Tsafendas's advocate in his summary trial.

Lionel Davis. Anti-apartheid activist. Imprisoned in Robben Island while Tsafendas was held there.

Achileas Dalamagkas. Psychologist.

Professor John Dugard. Professor of Law and Judge at the International Court of Justice.

Judge Gerald Friedman. Retired Judge.

Dr. Costa Gazidis. Anti-apartheid activist. Cousin of Rika Nikolatos, a social worker who visited Tsafendas in prison and in the hospital.

Janet Gazidis. Wife of Costas Gazidis, who knew Nikolatos very well.

Denis Goldberg. Anti-apartheid activist. Imprisoned in Pretoria Central Prison at the same time as Tsafendas, but he never met him.

Krish Govender. Former Durban State-Attorney and anti-apartheid activist; he made a request in the TRC to examine Tsafendas's case.

Mike Grispos. Son of Helen and George Grispos. George Grispos was Tsafendas's schoolmate and childhood friend.

Maria Kasimatis. She lived in Lourenço Marques at the time of the assassination.

Ronnie Kasrils. Founding member of the Umkhonto we Sizwe and former Minister for Intelligence Services.

Ahmed Kathrada. Anti-apartheid activist. Imprisoned in Robben Island while Tsafendas was held there.

Ayten Kececi. Head of Limasollu Naci, the college in Istanbul where Tsafendas worked in 1960.

Jan-Ake Kjellberg. UN police officer. He handled Tsafendas's file in the TRC.

Elias Kokkinos. From the Eleni, he was present in Venice when the crew was questioned.

Dr. Anton Krueger. Academic and playwright. He wrote a play about Tsafendas.

Dr. Peter Lambley. Psychologist and author of The Psychology of Apartheid. He knew Reyner van Zyl and Dr. Cooper who examined Tsafendas and referred to his case in the book.

Adviye Vedia Limasollu. Wife of Limasollu Naci, owner of the college of the same name, where Tsafendas worked while in Istanbul.

Tunc Limasollu. Son of Limasollu Naci, owner of the college with the same name where Tsafendas worked while in Istanbul.

Alan Lomas. He was involved with the case in 1966 and the Commission of Enquiry referred to him.

Dr. Evangelos Mantzaris. Academic, expert on trade unions in South Africa and of the Greeks of South Africa.

Solly Mapaila. First Deputy General Secretary of the South African Communist Party.

Judge Robin Marais. Retired Judge.

Costas Maroudas. He lived in Johannesburg at the time of the assassination. Son-in-law of Father Minas Constandinou and grandson of Father Bertolis, the priest who baptised Tsafendas and knew him throughout his life.

Tessa Marwick. Theatre director. She directed the play Tsafendas in 1976 in London.

Michael Meadowcroft. British former MP with the Liberal Party and honorary President of the National Liberal Club.

Michalis Michelis. Journalist who extensively researched Tsafendas's case in 1987.

Saul Molobi. South Africa's consul general in Milan. He took an interest in Tsafendas's case in the 1990s.

Abhilash Nair. Law academic.

John Nankin. Director, actor and stage designer. He did some research on Tsafendas in the mid-1970s for William Tanner's play "Tsafendas."

Dumisa Ntsebeza. Advocate who co-authored the Unfinished Business: South Africa, Apartheid and Truth.

Akis Papageorgiou. President of the Greek Community of Pretoria in the early 1990s.

Emmanuel Perselis. From the Eleni, he was present in Venice when the crew was questioned.

Piers Pigou, International Crisis Group's Senior Consultant for Southern Africa and TRC Investigator.

Susan Pratt. David Pratt's daughter.

Elizabeth Radsma. David Pratt's personal assistant and secretary.

Professor Phillip Resnick. Forensic psychiatrist.

Judge Albie Sachs. Retired Judge and anti-apartheid activist.

Professor Robert L. Sadoff, clinical Professor of Psychiatry and Director of the Center for Studies in Social-Legal Psychiatry at the University of Pennsylvania, former president of the American Academy of Psychiatry and the Law, as well as the American Board of Forensic Psychiatry.

Dr. James Sanders. Author and researcher, specialising in South Africa.

Emanuel Sakellaridis. Eleni's former captain. He was aware of the questioning of the crew in Venice.

Dr. Aditya Sharma. Consultant psychiatrist.

Renos Spanoudes. Actor and drama teacher. He played Tsafendas in the play Living in Strange Lands.

Guy Spiller. Filmmaker. He made a documentary about David Pratt.

Piet Swanepoel. Former BOSS agent.

Dr. Arjun Thampy. Consultant psychiatrist.

Aris Tsafantakis. Tsafendas's cousin, Tsafendas stayed at his parents' house in Crete in 1962.

Maria Tsafantakis. Granddaughter of Costas Kargakis, whose house Tsafendas stayed in while in Crete and who taught him to make bombs.

Michalis Tsafandakis. Tsafendas's nephew and husband of Maria Tsafantakis.

Stelios Tsafantakis. Tsafendas's cousin. He was in Crete when Tsafendas visited the island in 1962.

Judge Zak Yacoob. Retired constitutional judge.

Professor Tuviah Zabow. Former Professor of forensic psychiatry at the University of Cape Town and former head of the forensic psychiatry unit at Valkenberg Hospital.

Dimitris Zitanelis. President of the Greek Community in Cape Town; he lived there at the time of the assassination.

Maria Vasilakis. Member of the Greek community in Johannesburg at the time of the assassination.

Dimitris Vergitsis. Former Greek-Orthodox priest who buried Tsafendas.

James J. Ward, Professor of History at the Cedar Crest College, Allentown, Pennsylvania, USA.

AUDIO-VISUAL

Carlos Angulló and Mandy Jacobson (2013) Plot for Peace.

Discovery Channel (1998) Apartheid's Last Stand.

Liza Key (1997) A Question of Madness.

Guy Spiller (1999) The Liberal and the Pirate.

Manolis Dimelas (2007) Live and Let Live.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

House of Assembly Debates (Hansard). Volumes from 1952, 1954, 1964 and 1966.
Government Printer.

House of Assembly Debates (Hansard) (1949) Debates of Parliament 1910-99. Cape Town:
Government Printer.

Report of the Commission Appointed to Investigate and Report on the Occurrences in the Districts of Vereeniging (namely, at Sharpeville location and Evaton) and Vanderbijlpark, Province of the Transvaal, on 21st March 1960. Pretoria, Government Printer. 1960.

Report of the Commission of Enquiry into the Circumstances of the Death of the late Dr. The Honourable Hendrik French Verwoerd. December 1966. R.PR. 16/67. Pretoria, Government Printer, 1966.

Report of the Commission of Enquiry into Secret Organisations. R.P. 20/1965. Pretoria, Government Printer. 1965.

Report of the Commission of Inquiry into Alleged Irregularities in the Former Department of Information. Pretoria, Government Printer. 1978.

Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Responsibility of Mentally Deranged Persons and Related Matters. R.PR. 69/1967. Pretoria: Government Printer, 1967.

PERSONAL COLLECTIONS

David Bloomberg's personal documents regarding Tsafendas

Desmond Blow's personal documents regarding David Pratt

Liza Key's personal documents regarding Tsafendas

Alexander Moubaris's personal documents regarding Tsafendas

Dr. James Sanders's personal documents regarding Tsafendas

Gordon Winter's personal documents regarding Tsafendas

NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

A Voz

Acropolis

Africa South

Anglo-Portuguese News

Atlanta Daily World

Business Day

Chicago Tribune

Bibliography

Newspapers & Periodicals

Cleveland Call and Post

Corriere Della Sera

Dagbreek

Daily Dispatch

Daily Mail

Daily Mirror

Daily News

Daily Representative

Der Spiegel

Der Tagesspiegel

Deutsche Zeitung

Die Beeld

Die Burger

Die Transvaler

Die Welt

Die Vaderland

Die Volksblad

Drum

Deues Deutchland

Economic and Political Weekly

El Mundo

Evening Standard

Frankfurter Allgemeine

Frankfurter Rundschau

Handelsblatt

Kathimerini

La Stampa

Le Courier d'Afrique

Le Monde

Le Monde Juif

Liberation

LIFE

Bibliography

Newspapers & Periodicals

Moscow News

Natal Mercury

Natal Witness

Neues Deutschland

New Journal and Guide

New York Amsterdam News

News Chronicle

Newsweek

Noticias

O Primeiro de Janeiro

Personality

Philadelphia Tribune

Pravda

Pretoria News

Rand Daily Mail

Revolution Africaine

Scope

South African Jewish Times

Sunday Express

Sunday Tribune

TIME (Magazine)

The Australian

The Canberra Times

The Cape Argus

The Cape Times

The Citizen

The Chicago Daily Defender

The Chronicle (Bulawayo)

The Economist

The Illustrated London News

The Independent

The Globe and Mail

The Guardian (London)

The Herald (Melbourne)

The New York Times

The Observer

The People

The Post

The Rhodesia Herald

The Sphere

The Stage

The Times (London)

The Spectator

The Star

The Sunday Times (London)

The Sunday Times (Johannesburg)

The Sunday Tribune

The Telegraph

The Vancouver Sun

To Vima

The Washington Post

Umtali Post

Zululand Times

SECONDARY SOURCES

BOOKS AND JOURNAL ARTICLES

A Distinguished South African Lawyer (who for obvious reasons must remain anonymous) (1965) Verwoerd's Police State. London: A Christian Action Pamphlet. London.

Aaranovitch, D. (2016) Party Animals: My Family and Other Communists. Jonathan Cape.

Abel, R.L. (1995) Politics by Other Means: Law in the Struggle against Apartheid, 1980-1994. Routledge.

Abraham, K. (1991) Politics of Black Nationalism: From Harlem to Soweto. Africa World Press.

- Abulof, U. (2015) The Mortality and Morality of Nations. Cambridge University Press.
- Adam, H. (1971) Modernizing Racial Domination: South Africa's Political Dynamics. Berkley: University of California Press.
- Addison, J. (1981) Apartheid (Today's World Series). Batsford Ltd.
- Adhikari, M. (2005) Not White Enough, Not Black Enough: Racial Identity in the South African Coloured Community. Ohio University Press.
- Adler, F.H. (2000) "South African Jews and Apartheid." Patterns of Prejudice, 34:4, 23-26.
- Africa Today (1962) "Take Action against Apartheid by Observing Human Rights Day." 1962, 16. Africa Today, Vol. 9, No. 8 (Oct., 1962), p. 16.
- Africa Today (1964) "Partners in Apartheid: United States Policy on South Africa." Africa Today, Vol. 11, No. 3, 2-17.
- African Affairs (1961) "Presentation to Mrs. Margaret Ballinger." African Affairs, Vol. 60, No. 240 (Jul., 1961), pp. 420-422.
- African National Congress (1976) A Message to Western Europe from African National Congress South Africa. African National Congress South Africa
- Ainslie, R., Robinson, D. (1963) The Collaborators. London: The Anti-Apartheid Movement.
- Ainslie, R. (1962) The Unholy Alliance: Salazar, Verwoerd, Welensky. London: Anti-Apartheid Movement.
- Ainslie, R. (1977) Masters and Serfs: Farm Labour in South Africa. International Defence and Aid Fund for South Africa.
- Akinturk, A.S. (2011) The Politics of English as a Foreign Language: The Case of Turkey. Ph.D. Thesis. Carleton University, Ottawa, Ontario.
- Albertyn, C.H. (1991) A Critical Analysis of Political Trials in South Africa 1948-1988. Ph.D. Thesis. University of Cambridge.
- Alexander, N. (1990) Education and the Struggle for National Liberation in South Africa. Skotaville Publishers.
- Alexander, N. (2013) Thoughts on the New South Africa. Jacana Media Ltd.
- Alhadeff, V. (1985) A Newspaper History of South Africa. Don Nelson: Cape Town.
- Allighan, G. (1961) Verwoerd-The End: A Look-Back from the Future. Cape Town: Purnell and Sons.
- Amnesty International (1978) Political Imprisonment in South Africa. London: Amnesty International Publications.

Ampiah, K. (1997) The Dynamics of Japan's Relation with Africa: South Africa, Tanzania and Nigeria. Routledge.

ANC (1988) The Spear of the Nation. Armed Struggle-Strategy and Tactics of the African National Congress. African National Congress.

Andrews, H.T., Berrill, F.A., Guingand, F., Holloway, J.E., Meyer, F., van Eck, H.J., van Schoor, A.M. (eds.) (1962) South Africa in the Sixties: A Socio-Economic Survey. Cape Town: South Africa Foundation.

Anti-Apartheid Movement (1974) Racism and Apartheid in Southern Africa. Paris: UNESCO Press.

Apostolakis, N. (2009) Cretan Family Names. Greek Ethos Organization. Retrieved from: <http://www.greekethos.org/2008/articles/01%20Crete/Cretan%20family%20names.pdf>

Arcot, R. (2015) "The Traumatic State of Psychology: An Investigation of the Challenges Psychologists Face When Aiming to Help Trauma Survivors in Post-Apartheid South Africa." Independent Study Project (ISP) Collection. Retrieved from: http://digitalcollections.sit.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=3065&context=isp_collection

Arnold, G. (2000) The New South Africa. Palgrave Macmillan.

Arnold, M. (ed.) (1981) Steve Biko: Black Consciousness in South Africa. Biko's Last Public Statement and Political Testament. Random House.

Asmal, K., Asmal, L., Roberts, R.S. (1996) Reconciliation through Truth: A Reckoning of Apartheid's Criminal Governance. Cape Town: David Philip Publisher.

Ashforth, A. (1990) "Reckoning Schemes of Legitimation: On Commissions of Inquiry as Power/Knowledge Forms." Journal of Historical Sociology. Volume 3, Issue, 1 March 1990 Pages 1–22.

Attwell, M. (1986) South Africa: Background to the Crisis. London: Sidgwick and Jackson.

Badiou, A. (2012) The Rebirth of History: Times of Riots and Uprisings. Verso Books.

Badat, S. (2013) The Forgotten People: Banishment under Apartheid. Leiden and Boston: Brill.

Baines, G. (2007) "The Master Narrative of South Africa's Liberation Struggle: Remembering and Forgetting June 16, 1976." The International Journal of African Historical Studies, Vol. 40, No. 2 (2007), pp.283-302.

Baker, J.T. (1965) "Human Rights in South Africa." Howard Law Journal, 11 (1965): 549-82.

Bale, J.M. (2006) "South Africa's Project Coast: 'Death Squads,' Covert State-Sponsored Poisonings, and the Dangers of CBW Proliferation." Democracy and Security, 2:27–59.

- Ballinger, M. (1969) From Union to Apartheid. Bailey Bros and Swinfen Ltd.
- Barber, J. (1999) South Africa in the Twentieth Century: A Political History – in Search of a Nation State. Blackwell.
- Barber, J., Barratt, J. (1990) South Africa's Foreign Policy: The Search for Status and Security, 1945-1988. Cambridge University Press.
- Barkon, J.L. (1961) "Apartheid in South Africa." Current History: Vol 40, 234.
- Baxter, L.C. (1985) "Doctors on Trial: Steve Biko, Medical Ethics, and the Courts." South African Journal on Human Rights, 137-151 (1985).
- BBC News. (2003) Obituary: Walter Sisulu. Monday, 5 May, 2003. Retrieved from: <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/africa/297039.stm>
- BBC News. (2015) Rhodes Statue Removed in Cape Town as Crowd Celebrates. 9 April 2015. Retrieved from: <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-africa-32236922>
- Beck, R.B. (2000) The History of South Africa. Greenwood Press.
- Beinart, W., Dubow, S. (eds.) (1995) Segregation and Apartheid in Twentieth-Century South Africa. Routledge.
- Beinart, W. (2001) Twentieth Century South Africa. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Beinart, W. (2011) "The Mpondo Revolt through the Eyes of Leonard Mdingi and Anderson Ganyile." In Kepe, T., Ntsebeza, L. (eds.) (2011) Rural Resistance in South Africa. The Mpondo Revolts after Fifty Years. BRILL.
- Belling, V. (2002) The Price They Paid: A Bibliographical Survey Of The Memoirs Of The Jews In The Struggle For Democracy And Human Rights In South Africa. Proceedings of the 37 Annual Convention of the Association of Jewish Libraries 1-10. June 23-26, 2002.
- Beningfield, J. (2006) The Frightened Land: Land, Landscape and Politics in South Africa in the Twentieth Century. London and New York: Routledge.
- Benson, M. (1960) The Badge of Slavery (The Pass Laws of South Africa). Christian Action Publications.
- Benson, M. (1963a) "The Destruction of Family Life." In Friedmann, M.V. (1963) I Will Still be Moved: Reports from South Africa. Arthur Baker: London.
- Benson, M. (1963b) Chief Albert Lutuli of South Africa. Oxford University Press.
- Benson, M. (1966) South Africa: The Struggle for a Birthright. Minerva Press.
- Benson, M. (ed.) (1974) The Sun Will Rise. Statements from the Dock by Southern African Political Prisoners. International Defence and Aid Fund.

Benson, M. (1986) Nelson Mandela: The Man and the Movement. New York: W.W. Norton & Company.

Bernstein, E. (1966) The American Jewish Yearbook. Vol 67, 451-456.

Bernstein, H. (1965) "Profile of an Afrikaner." Transition, No. 23, 1965, 22-24.

Bernstein, H. (1972) South Africa: The Terrorism of Torture. International Defence and Aid Fund.

Bernstein, H. (1975) For their Triumphs and their Tears: Women in Apartheid South Africa. International and Defence Fund.

Berridge, G.R. (1992) South Africa, the Colonial Powers and "African Defence." Houndmills and London: MacMillan.

Beyers, C.J. (ed.) (1981) Dictionary of South African Biography, Vol 4. HSRC Press.

Bishop, M. (2014) "An Accidental Good: The Role of Commissions of Inquiry in South African Democracy." New York Law School. Law Review. Twenty Years of South African Constitutionalism. Friday, November 14, 2014.

Bizos, G. (1998) No One to Blame? A Personal Account of Inquests into Some Deaths in Detention under Apartheid. David Philip Publishers.

Bizos, G. (2011) Odyssey to Freedom. Umuzi.

Black, M. (1965) No Room for Tourists. London: Secker and Warburg.

Bloom, L. (1967) "The Coloured People of South Africa." Phylon, Vol. 28, No. 2: 139-150.

Bloomberg, C. (1990) Christian-Nationalism and the Rise of the Afrikaner Broederbond in South Africa, 1918-1948. Houndmills and London: MacMillan.

Bloomberg, D. (2007) My Times: The Memoirs of David Bloomberg. Fernwood Press.

Blumberg, M. (1960) "The Mafekeng Affair." Africa South. April/June 1960.

Blumenfeld, J. (ed.) (1987) South Africa in Crisis. Routledge.

Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press.

Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (1993) "The Shaping of Apartheid." In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press.

Booth, D. (1998) The Race Game. Sport and Politics in South Africa. Frank Cass Publishers.

Bosch, D.J. (1979) "Racism and Revolution: Response of the Churches in South Africa." Occasional Bulletin. (January 1979) 14-20.

- Boshoff, A. (1974) Sekretaresse vir die Verwoerds. Human & Rousseau: Cape Town and Pretoria.
- Botha, J. (1967) Verwoerd is Dead. Cape Town: Books of Africa.
- Bourne, P.G. (1986) Fidel: A Biography of Fidel Castro. Dodd Mead.
- Breckenridge, K. (2005). "Verwoerd's Bureau of Proof: Total Information in the Making of Apartheid." History Workshop Journal, No. 59, 83-108.
- Breckenridge, K. (2014) Biometric State: The Global Politics of Identification and Surveillance in South Africa, 1850 to the Present. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Breytenbach, B. (1985) The True Confessions of an Albino Terrorist. Faber and Faber.
- Brickhill, J. (1976) Race against Race: South Africa's "Multi-national" Sport Fraud. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.
- Brink, A. (2009) A Fork in the Road. A Memoir. Harvill Secker: London.
- Brink, E., Krige, S., Lebelo, S., Malungane, G., (2010) Soweto: 16 June 1976. NB Publishers.
- British Council of Churches (1965) The Future of South Africa. London: SCM Press Ltd.
- Broderick, J.J. (1960) "Role of the Psychiatrist and Psychiatric Testimony in Civil and Criminal Trials." Notre Dame Law Review. Vol 35, Issue 4. 8 January 1960.
- Brookes, E.G. (1968) Apartheid: A Documentary Study of Modern South Africa. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul.
- Broun, K. S. (2012) Saving Nelson Mandela: The Rivonia Trial and the Fate of South Africa. Oxford University Press.
- Brotz, H. (1977) The Politics of South Africa: Democracy and Racial Diversity. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Brown, T. S. (2016) Weimar Radicals: Nazis and Communists between Authenticity and Performance. Berghahn Books.
- Browett, J. (1982) "The Evolution of Unequal Development within South Africa: An Overview." In Smith, D. M. (ed.) (1982) Living under Apartheid: Aspects of Urbanization and Social Change. London: George Allen and Unwin. 10-23.
- Brunner, E. D. (1955) "Problems and Tensions in South Africa Source." Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 70, No. 3, 368-386.
- Bundy, C. (1994) "At War with the Future? Black South African Youth in the 1990s." In Stedman, S.J. (ed.) (1994) South Africa: The Political Economy of Transformation. Lynne Rienner Publishers: Boulder and London.

- Bunting, B. (1959) Apartheid: The Road to Poverty. Cape Town: Real Printing and Publishing.
- Bunting, B. (ed.) (1981) South African Communists Speak: Documents from the History of the South African Communist Party 1915-1980. London: Inkululeko Publications.
- Bunting, B. (1986, originally published in 1968) The Rise of the South African Reich. London: International and Defence and Aid Fund for South Africa.
- Bunting, I. (2006) "The Higher Education Landscape under Apartheid." In Cloete, N. (2006) Transformation in Higher Education: Global Pressures and Local Realities. London: Springer. 35-52.
- Buntman, F.L. (2003) Robben Island and Prisoner Resistance to Apartheid. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Burger, M. (1961) Dr Verwoerd of South Africa: Architect of Doom. A Christian Action Pamphlet.
- Burke, A. (2006) "Mental Health Care during Apartheid in South Africa: An Illustration of How 'Science' Can Be Abused." In Parry, J.T. (ed.) (2006) Evil, Law and the State: Perspectives on State Power and Violence. Rodopi B.V: Amsterdam-New York.
- Bush, B. (1999) Imperialism, Race and Resistance: Africa and Britain, 1919-1945. Routledge.
- Buthelezi, M. G. (1974) White and Black Nationalism, Ethnicity, and Future of the Homelands. South African Institute of Race Relations.
- Buthelezi, M. G. (1990) South Africa: My Vision of the Future. Weidenfeld and Nicholson.
- Buthelezi, J. C. (2006) Rolihlahla Dalibhunga Nelson Mandela. London: Trafford Publishing.
- Cachalia, Y. (1990) "The Evolution of a Decade." In Schadeberg, J. (ed.) (1990) Nelson Mandela and the Rise of the ANC. Bloomsbury Publishing Limited.
- Callinicos, A. (1992) Between Apartheid and Capitalism. Conversations with South African Socialists. Bookmarks.
- Callinicos, A. (1995) South Africa: Between Reform and Revolution. Bookmarks
- Callinicos, A., Rogers, J. (1977) Southern Africa after Soweto. Pluto Press Limited.
- Callinicos L. (2005) Oliver Tambo. Beyond the Engeli Mountains. David Philip Publishers.
- Calpin, G. H. (1951) "South Africa in Afrikaner Hands." Foreign Affairs, Vol. 29, No. 3 pp. 417-423.

- Calpin, G.H. (1968) At Least we have got our Country Back. Buren Publishers. Cape Town.
- Calvocoressi, P. (1961) South Africa and World Opinion. Oxford University Press.
- Cameron, T. (1994) Jan Smuts: An Illustrated Biography. Human & Rousseau.
- Campbell, C. (2012) "Beyond Radicalisation: Toward an Integrated Strategy." In Salinas de Frias, A., Samuel, K. and White, N. (2012) Counter-Terrorism: International Law and Practice. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 255-82.
- Carter, G. M. (1954) "Can Apartheid Succeed in South Africa?" Foreign Affairs. January 1954, Vol. 32, 296.
- Carter, G. M. (1958) The Politics of Inequality: South Africa since 1948. London: Thames and Hudson.
- Cawthra, G. (1986) Brutal Force: The Apartheid War Machine. International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.
- Cell, J. W. (1982) The Highest Stage of White Supremacy: The Origins of Segregation in South Africa and the American South. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Centre for African Studies (1978) J.B Vorster: A Political Backgrounder. Bureau of National and International Communication, SA Embassy.
- Citino, R. (1991) Germany and the Union of South Africa in the Nazi Period. Greenwood Press: New York.
- Chaldeos, A.A. (2015) The Greek Community in Mozambique.
- Chisholm, L. (2002) "Continuity and Change in Education Policy Research and Borrowing in South Africa." In Kallaway, P. (ed.) (2002) The History of Education under Apartheid 1948-1994: The Doors of Learning and Culture Shall be Opened. Peter Lang Publishing Inc. 93-108.
- Christian Action (1955) The Dispossessed: The Human Tragedy of Apartheid. Christian Action.
- Christopher, A.J. (1994) The Atlas of Apartheid. London and New York: Routledge.
- Choonoo, R. N. (1997) "The Sophiatown Generation: Black Literary Journalism during the 1950s." In Switzer, L. (ed.) (1997) South Africa's Alternative Press: Voices of Protest and Resistance, 1880s-1960s. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 252-65.
- Clark, S. (1986) "Introduction." In Harsch, E. (1986) Apartheid's Grand Land Theft. The Struggles for the Right to Farm in South Africa. Pathfinder Press.
- Clark, N L., Worger, W. H. (2011) South Africa: The Rise and Fall of Apartheid. 2 Edition. Harrow: Longman.

Clark, P.J. (2012) Lives that Made a Difference. Eloquent Books.

Clingman, S. (2013) Bram Fischer: Afrikaner Revolutionary (2nd edition). Jacana Media.

Cole, E. (1968) House of Bondage. A South African Black Man Exposes in his Own Pictures and Words the Bitter Life of his Homeland Today. London: The Penguin Press.

Cole, S. M. (2015) "Just in Transition: South Africa Political Trials, 1956-1964." In Allo, A. (ed.) (2015) The Courtroom as a Space of Resistance: Reflections on the Legacy of the Rivonia Trial. Ashgate Pub Co.

Collins, R. O. (1990) Central and South African History. New York: Markus Wiener Publishing.

Coniglio, R. (2012) "Methods of Judicial Decision-Making and the Rule of Law: The Case of Apartheid South Africa." Boston University International Law Journal. Vol. 30. 498-527.

Conference Steering Committee (1964) "Sanctions and World Peace." In Segal, R. (ed.) (1964) Sanctions against South Africa. Penguin Books. 94-106.

Cook, A. (1974) South Africa: The Imprisoned Society. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.

Coombes, A.E. (2003) History After Apartheid: Visual Culture and Public Memory in a Democratic South Africa. Duke University Press.

Cooper, G. (2016) Under Devil's Peak: The Life and Times of Wilfrid Cooper, an Advocate in the Age of Apartheid. Burnet Media.

Cooper, S., Nicholas, L.J., Seedat, M., Statman, J.M. (1990) "Psychology and Apartheid: The Struggle for Psychology in South Africa." In Nicholas, L.J., Cooper, S. (1990) Psychology and Apartheid. A Vision/Madiba Publication.

Corke, M.A.S. (1978) "A School System for our Society." In Senate Special Lectures (1978) South Africa's Crisis in Education. University of Witwatersrand.

Couzens, T. (1984) History of the Black Press in South Africa, 1836-1960. Additional Seminar Paper. University of the Witwatersrand Institute for Advanced Social Research.

Cronje, S. (1964) Witness in the Dark: Police Torture and Brutality in South Africa. London: The Anti-Apartheid Movement.

Cros, B. (1996) "Why South Africa's Television is only Twenty Years Old: Debating Civilisation, 1958-1969." Alizes (Trade Winds) Revue Angliciste de La Reunion, No 12. October 1996.

Crowd, N. and Revo, C. (1967) The Pattern of Assassination. Boomerang Publications.

Currie, I. (2011) "The Judiciary and Freedom of Speech in South Africa." In Lee, H.P. (ed.) (2011) Judiciaries in Comparative Perspectives. Cambridge University Press.

- D'Amato, A. (1966a) "The Bantustan Proposals for South-West Africa." The Journal of Modern African Studies, 177-192.
- D'Amato, (196b) "Apartheid in South West Africa: Five Claims of Equality." Portia Law Journal. 59, Vol. 1, 59-76.
- D'Oliveira, J. (1977) Vorster – The Man. Ernest Stanton.
- Daniel, J., Vale, P. (2009) "South Africa: Where were we looking in 1968?" In Gassert, P. and Klimke, M. (eds.) (2009) 1968 - Memories and Legacies of a Global Revolt. Washington, DC: German Historical Institute.
- Darnborough, A. (1967) Labour's Record on Southern Africa. London: Anti-Apartheid Movement.
- Davenport, T.R.H. (1991) South Africa: A Modern History. Houndmills and London: McMillan.
- Davenport, R., Saunders, C. (2000a) "The English-language Press under Apartheid." South African Historical Journal. Vol. 43. No. 1. 267-76.
- Davenport, R., Saunders, C. (2000b) South Africa: A Modern History. Macmillan Press Ltd.
- Davis, D. (1978) African Workers and Apartheid. International Defence and Aid Fund.
- Davis, D., le Roux, M. (2009) Precedent and Possibility: The (Ab)use of Law in South Africa. Double Storey.
- Davis, R.H. (ed.) (1991) Apartheid Unravels. Gainesville: University of Florida Press.
- Davis, S.M. (1987) Apartheid's Rebels: Inside South Africa's Hidden War. Yale University Press.
- de Beer, C. (1984) The South African Disease: Apartheid Health and Health Services. South African Research Service.
- de Broglio, C. (1970) Apartheid in Sport. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.
- de Kiewiet, C.W. (1964) "Loneliness in the Beloved Country." Foreign Affairs, Vol. 42, 413-427.
- de Klerk, W.A. (1975) The Puritans in Africa: Story of Afrikanerdom. Africa Book Centre Ltd.
- Denoon, D., Nyeko, B. (1989) South Africa Since 1800. Longman: London and New York.
- Desai, A. (2015) "Indian South African and the Black Consciousness Movement under Apartheid." Diaspora Studies, Vol 8, Issue 1, p. 37-50.

- Desai, B., Marney, C. (1978) The Killing of the Imam: South African Tyranny Defied by Courage and Faith. Quartet Books.
- Desmond, C. (1971) The Discarded People. Penguin Books.
- Devenish, G.E. (2012) "The Republican Constitution of 1961 Revisited: A Re-Evaluation after Fifty Years" Fundamina. Vol. 18 No 1, 1-14.
- de Klerk, F.W. (1999) The Last Trek. A New Beginning. Pan Books.
- de St. Jorre, J. (1976) Inside the Laager: White Power in South Africa Foreign Affairs. 1 October 1976: 55, 1.
- de Villiers, L. (1975) South Africa: A Skunk Among Nations. International Books.
- de Villiers, R. (1971) "Afrikaner Nationalism." In Wilson, M., Thompson, L. (1971) The Oxford History of South Africa. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 365-416.
- Diemont, M. A. (1995) Brushes with the Law. Human & Rousseau.
- Dlamini, M. (1984) Robben Island, Hell-Hole: Reminiscences of a Political Prisoner. Nottingham: Spokesman.
- Dowdall, T.L. (1991) "Repression, Health Care and Ethics under Apartheid." Journal of Medical Ethics, 1991, 17, Supplement 51-54.
- Doxey, G.V. (1963) "The South African Problem: A Conflict of Nationalism." International Journal: Canada's Journal of Global Policy Analysis. Volume: 18. Issue: 4. 501-12.
- Drew, A. (ed.) (1996) South Africa's Radical Tradition: A Documentary History. Volume 1: 1907-1950. University of Cape Town Press.
- Drury, A. (1968) A Very Strange Society: A Journey to the Heart of South Africa. London: Michael Joseph.
- Dubow, S. (1987) "Race, Civilisation and Culture: The Elaboration of Segregationist discourse in the Inter-War Years." In Marks, S., Trapido, S. (eds.) (1987) The Politics of Race, Class and Nationalism in Twentieth Century South Africa. London and New York: Longman. 71-94.
- Dubow, S. (1992) "Afrikaner Nationalism, Apartheid and the Conceptualization of 'Race.'" The Journal of African History, Vol. 33, No. 2, 209-237.
- Dubow, S. (1995a) Scientific Racism in Modern South Africa. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Dubow, S. (1995b) "The Elaboration of Segregationist Ideology." In Beinart, W., Dubow, S. (eds.) (1995) Segregation and Apartheid in Twentieth-Century South Africa. Routledge, 145-175.

Dubow, S. (2014) Apartheid 1948-1994. Oxford: Oxford Histories.

Dubow, S. (2015) Racial Irredentism, Ethnogenesis, and White Supremacy in High Apartheid South Africa. Public talk given by Saul Dubow at the University of Witwatersrand on the 15th of October 2015.

Dubula, S. (1965) The Menace of Apartheid. Peace and Socialism Publishers.

Dugard, C.J.R. (1965) "Foreign Affairs and Public International Law." Annual Survey South African Law. 1965: 51-64.

Dugard, J. (1978) Human Rights and the South African Legal Order. Princeton University Press: Princeton, New Jersey.

Dugard, J. (1987) Recognition and the United Nations. Cambridge University Press.

Dugard, J. (1997) "Is the Truth and Reconciliation Process Compatible with International Law? An Unanswered Question." 13 S. Afr. J. on Hum. Rts. 258 1997.

Dugard, J. (1998a) "The South African Judiciary and International Law in Apartheid Era." 14 S. Afr. J. on Hum. Rts. 110 1998.

Dugard, J. (1998b) "Reconciliation and Justice: The South African Experience." 8 Transnat'l L. & Contemp. Probs. 277 1998.

Duncan, P. (1963) "Toward a World Policy for South Africa." Foreign Affairs. Vol 42 (October 1963): 38 1963-1964.

du Preez, M. (2008) Of Tricksters, Tyrants and Turncoats. Zebra Press.

Durgun, U. R. (2013) A General Outlook on Teaching Foreign Language via Distance Learning in Turkey.

du Toit, B. M. (1991) "The Far Right in Current South African Politics." Journal of Modern African Studies. Vol. 29. No. 4, 627-67.

Dyzenhaus, D. (2003, first published in 1998) Judging the Judges, Judging Ourselves: Truth, Reconciliation and the Apartheid Legal Order. Hart Publishing. Oxford.

Dyzenhaus, D. (2010) Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems: Pathologies of Legality. Oxford University Press.

Dvorin, E. P. (1952) Racial Separation in South Africa: An Analysis of Apartheid Theory. The Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

D' Oliveira, J. (1977) Vorster – The Man. Ernest Stanton Publishers.

Eades, L.M. (1999) The End of Apartheid in South Africa. Greenwood Press.

Edgar, R.E. (ed.) (1990) Sanctioning Apartheid. Africa World Press, Inc.

El-Khawas, M. (1971) "The Third-World Stance on Apartheid: The U.N. Record". The Journal of Modern African Studies, Vol. 9, No. 3, 443-452.

Elphick, P. (2006) Liberty: The Ships That Won the War. US Naval Institute Press.

Elphick, R. (2012) The Equality of Believers: Protestant Missionaries and the Racial Politics of South Africa. University of Virginia Press.

En so Haber (2012) "Limasollu Naci kimdir." 23 May 2012. Retrieved from: <http://www.ensonhaber.com/limasollu-naci-kimdir-2012-05-23.html>

Evans, I. (1997) Bureaucracy and Race: Native Administration in South Africa. Berkley: University of California Press.

Farah, A. A. (1974) "South Africa's Apartheid Policy; An Assessment." In El-Ayouty, Y. and Brooks, H. (eds.) (1974) Africa and International Organization. Springer. 71-102.

Fasulo, G. (1970) The Powers Behind Apartheid. Africa Research Group. Boston: New England Free Press.

February, V. (1991) The Afrikaners of South Africa. Kegan Paul International: London and New York.

Feit, E. (1967) African Opposition in South Africa: The Failure of Passive Resistance. Stanford: The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace.

Field, S. (1998) "From the 'Peaceful Past' to the 'Violent Present': Memory, Myth and Identity in Guguletu." In Howarth, D.R., Norval, A.J. (eds.) (1998) South Africa in Transition: New Theoretical Perspectives. Palgrave Macmillan.

Fieldhouse, R. (2005) Anti-Apartheid: A History of the Movement in Britain. London: The Merlin Press.

First, R. (2006) 117 Days: An Account of Confinement and Interrogation under the South African 90-Day Detention Law. Penguin.

Fisher, J. (1969) The Afrikaners. London: Cassel and Company.

Fleisch, B. (2002) "State Formation and the Origins of Bantu Education." In Kallaway, P. (ed.) (2002) The History of Education under Apartheid 1948-1994: The Doors of Learning and Culture Shall be opened. Peter Lang Publishing Inc.

Fobi, B.T. (2014) The Engineers of History: Hendrik Verwoerd, George Wallace, and the Power of Historical Memory. Ph.D. thesis. Yale University.

Forsyth, F. (2015) The Outsider: My Life in Intrigue. Bantam Press.

Foster, D. (1987) Detention and Torture in South Africa: Psychological, Legal and Historical Studies. London: James Curry.

Foster, D. (1991) "Race and Racism in South African Psychology." South African Journal of Psychology, December 1991, Vol. 21, No. 4, 203-210.

Foster, D. (1993) "On Racism, Virulent Mythologies and Fragile Threads." In Nicholas, L. (1993) Psychology and Oppression: Critiques and Proposals. Johannesburg: Skotaville Publishers. 55-81.

Frankel, G. (1999) Rivonia's Children: Three Families and the Cost of Conscience in White South Africa. New York: Farrar, Strauss and Giroux.

Frankel, P. (2001) An Ordinary Atrocity: Sharpeville and Its Massacre. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.

Freeman, L.R. (1915) "Rhodes's 'All Red' Route: The Effect of the War on the Cape-To-Cairo and the Control of a Continent." In Page, W.H., Page, A.W. (2012) The World's Work, Volume 29; A History of our Time. RareBooksClub.com.

Friedman, G., Gauntlett, J. (2013) Bar, Bench and Bullshiflers. Cape Tales 1950-1990. Siber Ink.

Froneman, J.D. (2000) "HF Verwoerd's Student Years: Cradle of his Political Career and Thought." Koers. Vol. 65. No. 3, 399-412.

Frye, W. (1970) In Whitest Africa: The Dynamics of Apartheid. Prentice-Hall INC., Englewood Cliffs, N.J.

Fullard, M. (2004) "State Repression in the 1960s." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2004) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 1 (1960-1970). Zebra Press: 341-90.

Furlong, P. J. (1983) The Mixed Marriages Act: An Historical and Theological Study. University of Cape Town.

Furlong, P. J. (1991) Between Crown and Swastika: The Impact of the Radical Right on the Afrikaner Nationalist Movement in the Fascist Era. Hanover and London: Wesleyan University Press.

Furlong, P.J. (2003) "Apartheid, Afrikaner Nationalism and the Radical Right: Historical Revisionism in Herman Gilomee's The Afrikaners." South African Historical Journal. Vol. 49, Issue 1, pp. 207-222.

Furlong, P.J. (2010) "The National Party of South Africa: A Transnational Perspective." In Durham, M., Power, M. (eds.) (2010) New Perspectives on the Transnational Right. Palgrave Macmillan.

Gailbraith, J. S. (1959) "The Tragedy of South Africa." Western Humanities Review: Jan 1, 1959: 264-82.

Gastrow, S. (1995) Who's Who in South African Politics: No.5. Johannesburg: Ravan Press.

Gerhart, G. M. (1978) Black Power in South Africa: the Evolution of an Ideology. Berkley: University of California Press.

Gevisser, M. (2007) Thabo Mbeki: The Dream Deferred. Jonathan Ball Publishers: Johannesburg and Cape Town.

Gibbs, H. (1949) Twilight in South Africa. Jarrolds.

Gifford, T. (1981) Southern Africa's Record of International Terrorism. United Nations Centre Against Apartheid. London: Anti-Apartheid Movement.

Gilbert, S. (2010) "Jews and the Racial State: Legacies of the Holocaust in Apartheid South Africa, 1945–60." Jewish Social Studies, Vol. 16, No. 3 (Spring/Summer 2010), pp. 32-64.

Giliomee, H., Schlemmer, L. (1990) From Apartheid to Nation-Building. Oxford University Press.

Giliomee, H. (2003) "The Making of the Apartheid Plan, 1929-1948." Journal of Southern African Studies, Vol. 29, No. 2 (Jun., 2003), pp. 373-392.

Giliomee, H. (2011). The Afrikaners: Biography of a People. London: Hurst and Company.

Giliomee, H. (2012) The Last Afrikaner Leaders: A Supreme Test of Power. Cape Town: Tafelburg.

Glaser, C. (1993) "When are They Going to Fight?" Tsotsis, Youth Politics and the PAC. In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press. 196-315.

Glaser, C. (2013) The ANC Youth League. Ohio University Press.

Glaser, D. (2001) Politics and Society in South Africa. London: Sage Publications.

Glejjeses, P. (2002) Conflicting Missions. Havana, Washington, and Africa, 1959-1976. The University of North Carolina Press. 1212

Gross, D.A. (2016) "How Should South Africa Remember the Architect of Apartheid?" Smithonian.com. 14 September 2016. Retrieved from: <http://www.smithsonianmag.com/history/how-should-south-africa-remember-architect-apartheid-180960449/?no-ist>

Goldberg, D. (2010) The Mission: A Life for Freedom in South Africa. Real African Publishers.

Goldin, I. (1987) "The Reconstitution of Coloured Identity in the Western Cape." In Marks, S., Trapido, S. (eds.) (1987) The Politics of Race, Class and Nationalism in Twentieth Century South Africa. London and New York: Longman. 1-70.

- Goodman, D. (2001) Fault Lines: Journeys into the New South Africa. University of California Press.
- Goodhew, D. (2004) Respectability and Resistance: A History of Sophiatown. Praeger Publishers. Westport, Connecticut.
- Gordin, J. (2008) Zuma: A Biography. Jonathan Ball Publishers.
- Gostick, R. (1978) The Moment of Truth, The World Council of Churches: A Soviet-Marxist Catspaw in Africa? The Canadian League of Rights.
- G. M. C. (1958) "The South African Election Appraised." The World Today, Vol. 14, No. 7 (July 1958), pp. 316-321.
- Gray, S. (1993) Human Interest and Other Pieces. Justified Press
- Graybill, L.S. (2002) Truth and Reconciliation in South Africa: Miracle or Model? Lynne Rienner Publishers, Inc.
- Grey, R. (1949) "South Africa under the Nationalist Party." International Journal, Vol. 4, No. 1, 52-59.
- Green, M. (2004) Around and About: Memoirs of a South African Newspaperman. David Philip Publishers.
- Grundy, K.W. (1973) Confrontation and Accommodation in Southern Africa: The Limits of Independence. University of California.
- Grundy, K.W. (1976) "Intermediary Power and Global Dependency: the Case of South Africa." International Studies Quarterly, Vol. 20, no. 4, 1976, pp. 553-580.
- Grundy, K.W. (1986) The Militarization of South African Politics. Indiana University Press.
- Grundy, K.W. (1991) South Africa: Domestic Crisis and Global Challenge. Westview Press Inc.
- Grobbelaar, P.W. (1967) This Was a Man. Human & Rousseau.
- Guelke, A. (2005) Rethinking the Rise and Fall of Apartheid. New York: Palgrave MacMillan.
- Gunther, M. (2004) "The National Committee of Liberation (NCL)/African Resistance Movement." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2004) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 1 (1960-1970). Zebra Press: 209-256.
- Gutsche, T. (1970) A Very Smart Medal: The Story of the Witwatersrand Agricultural Society. Howard Timmins. Cape Town.
- Hachten, W.A., Giffard, C.A. (1984) The Press and Apartheid: Repression and Propaganda in South Africa. The University of Wisconsin Press.

- Haekkerup, P. (1964) "The South African Racial Crisis and the World." In Segal, R. (ed.) (1964) Sanctions Against South Africa. Penguin Books. 42-61.
- Haigh, A. (1962) South African Tragedy. Consul Books.
- Hain, P. (1996) Sing the Beloved Country: The Struggle for the New South Africa. Pluto Press: Chicago, Ill.
- Hahlo, H.R., Kahn, E.J. (1960) The Union of South Africa: The Development of its Laws and Constitution. London: Stevens & Sons, Ltd.
- Halisi, C.R.D. (1999) Black Political Thought in the Making of South African Democracy. Indiana University Press.
- Hall, M. (1990) Farmers, Kings and Traders: the People of South Africa, 200-1860. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.
- Hann, D. (2013) Physical Resistance. A Hundred Years of Anti-Fascism. Zero Books.
- Hanf, T., Weiland, H., Vierdag, G. (1981) South Africa: The Prospects for Peaceful Change. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Harrison, D. (1981) The White Tribe of Africa: South Africa in Perspective. University of California Press.
- Harrison, N. (1986) Winnie Mandela: Mother of a Nation. Harper Collins Publishers Ltd.
- Harrison, R. (2006) The Black Christ: A Journey to Freedom. David Philip Publishers.
- Harsch, E. (1980) South Africa: White Rule, Black Revolt. New York: Monad Press.
- Harsch, E. (1986) Apartheid's Grand Land Theft. The Struggles for the Right to Farm in South Africa. Pathfinder Press.
- Haysom, N. (1986) "The Langa Shootings and the Kannemeyer Commission of Enquiry." 8 Human Rights Quarterly 494, 1986.
- Haywood, C. (2000) A History of South African Literature. Cambridge University Press.
- Heard, K.A. (1974) General Elections in South Africa, 1943-70. London: Oxford University Press.
- Heilbrun, K., Rosenfeld, B., Warren, J., Collins, S. (1994) "The Use of Third-Party Information in Forensic Assessments: A Two-State Comparison." Bull Am Acad Psychiatry Law, Vol. 22, No. 3, 1994.
- Heilbrun, K., Marczyk, G.R., DeMatteo, D. (2002) Forensic Mental Health Assessment: A Casebook. Oxford University Press.

- Heilbrun, K., Warren, J., Picarello, K. (2003) "Third Party Information in Forensic Assessment." In Goldstein, A.M., Weiner, I.B. (eds.) (2003) Handbook of Psychology, Vol. 11: Forensic Psychology. John Wiley and Sons, Inc.
- Heilbrun, K., Grisso, T., Goldstein, A.M. (2007) Foundations of Forensic Mental Health Assessment. Oxford University Press.
- Heilbrun, K., NeMoyer, A., King, C., Galloway, M. (2015) "Using Third-Party Information in Forensic Mental-Health Assessment: A Critical Review." Court Review; 2015, Vol. 51 Issue 1.
- Hellig, J. (2009) "German Jewish Immigration to South Africa during the 1930s: Revisiting the Charter of the SS Stuttgart." Jewish Culture and History, Vol. 11, Issue 1-2, pp. 124-138.
- Henkes, B. (2016) "Shifting Identifications in Dutch-South African Migration Policies (1910–1961)." South African Historical Journal. Volume 68, 2016 - Issue 4.
- Hepple, A. (1966) South Africa: A Political and Economic History. London: Pall Mall.
- Hepple, A. (1967) Verwoerd. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books.
- Hepple, A. (1969) "South Africa's Bureau for State Security." World Today; 1 October 1969.
- Hepple, A. (1974) Press under Apartheid. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.
- Hepple, A. (1971) South Africa: Workers under Apartheid. An International Defence and Aid Fund Pamphlet.
- Hepple, A., Ainslie, R. (1965) "South Africa's Labour Problems." The World Today. Vol. 21, No.2, 65-72.
- Hepple, B. (2011) Alex Hepple: South African Socialist. South African History Online Lives of Courage Series. Cape Town: South African History Online.
- Herbstein, D., Evenson, J. (1989) The Devils are Among US: The War for Namibia. Zed Books Ltd: London and New Jersey.
- Herbstein, D. (2004) White Lies: Canon Collins and the Secret War against Apartheid. Oxford: James Curry.
- Higgins, R. (1964) "International Action and Domestic Jurisdiction." In Segal, R. (ed.) (1964) Sanctions Against South Africa. Penguin Books. 85-94.
- Higgins, R. (1970) "The United Nations and Lawmaking: The Political Organs." The American Journal of International Law Vol. 64, No. 4, The United Nations: Appraisal at 25 Years (September 1970), pp. 37-48.
- Higginson, J. (2014) Collective Violence and the Agrarian Origins of South African Apartheid, 1900-1948. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Hirson, B. (1990) Yours for the Union. London and New Jersey: Zed Books Limited.
- Hirson, B. (2005) History of the Left in South Africa: Writings of Baruch Hirson. I.B.Tauris.
- Holmes, C. (1964) A Time to Choose. The Student Christian Movement.
- Holness, M. (1983) Apartheid's War against Angola. United Nations Centre against Apartheid.
- Honey, A. (2000) "South Africa and the Olympic Movement." Bridging Three Centuries: Fifth Olympic Symposium for Olympic Research, pp. 177-84.
- Hopkins, K. (2015) "Assessing the World's Response to Apartheid: A Historical Account of International Law and its Part in the South African Transformation." 10 University of Miami International and Comparative Law Review. 241. (2015).
- Horrell, M. (1964) A Decade of Bantu Education. South African Institute for Racial Relations. Johannesburg.
- Horrell, M. (1978) Laws Affecting Race Relations in South Africa 1948-1976 (to the End of 1976). South African Institute of Race Relations.
- Houser, G. M. (1966) "What can the US Do about Apartheid." Africa Today, Vol. 13, No. 3, (March 1966) pp. 4-6, 16.
- Houston, G., Magubane, B. (2007) "The ANC Political Underground in the 1970s." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2007) The Road to Democracy in South Africa: 1970-1980, Vol 2. UNISA Press.
- Huddleston, T. (1987, first published in 1956) Naught for your Comfort. William Collins Sons & Co. Ltd.
- Huddleston, T., Collins, C. L. J., Raynes, F., Scott, M. (1957) Four Words on South Africa. London: Christian Action.
- Hughes, J. (1961) The New Face of Africa. South of the Sahara. Longmans, Green and Co.
- Human & Rousseau (1999) They Shaped our Century: The Most Influential South Africans of the Twentieth Century. Human & Rousseau.
- Hunt, E., Kimonis, E.R. (2015) "Third-Party Information." In Cautin, R.L., Lilienfeld, S.O. (eds.) (2015) The Encyclopaedia of Clinical Psychology. John Wiley & Sons.
- Huntington, M.K. (1958) "The Indian Minority Problem in the Union of South Africa." World Affairs, Vol. 121, No. 2, 43-46.
- Hutton, B. (1994) Robben Island: Symbol of Resistance. Johannesburg: Mayibuye Books.
- Hyslop, J. (1989) "School Boards, School Committees and Educational Politics: Aspects of the Failures of Bantu Education as a Hegemonic Strategy, 1955-1976." In Bonner, P.,

Hofmeyr, I., James, D., Lodge, T. (eds.) (1989) Holding Their Ground: Class, Locality and Culture in 19th and 20th Century South Africa. Johannesburg: Witwatersrand University Press. 201-27.

Hyslop, J. (1993) “‘A Destruction is Coming In.’ Bantu Education as Response to Social Crisis.” In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid’s Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press, 393-410.

Hyslop, J. (1995) “White Working-class Women and the Invention of Apartheid: ‘Purified’ Afrikaner Nationalist Agitation for Legislation Against ‘Mixed’ Marriages, 1934–9.” The Journal of African History. Volume 36, Issue 1, March 1995, pp. 57-81.

Hyslop, J. (1999) The Classroom Struggle: Policy and Resistance in South Africa 1940-1990. University of Natal Press. Pietermaritzburg.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1967) South African Prisons and the Red Cross Investigation. International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1969a) South Africa: The BOSS Law. International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1969b) “Resettlement” – The New Violence to Africans. International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1970) Trial by Torture: The Case of the 22. International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1975a) BOSS: The First Five Years. International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1975b) South Africa: Apartheid Quiz. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa (1983) Apartheid: the Facts. London: International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.

International Defence and Aid Fund (1988) Apartheid’s Violence Against Children. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.

International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa, in Co-operation with the United Nations Centre Against Apartheid (1981) Women Under Apartheid. International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.

Inwood, G.J., Johns, C.M. (2014a) “Why Study Commissions of Inquiry?” In Inwood, G.J., Johns, C.M. (eds.) (2014) Commissions of Inquiry and Policy Change: A Comparative Analysis. University of Toronto Press. pp 3-19.

Inwood, G.J., Johns, C.M. (2014b) “Commissions of Inquiry and Policy Change: A Comparative Analysis.” In Inwood, G.J., Johns, C.M. (eds.) (2014) Commissions of Inquiry and Policy Change: A Comparative Analysis. University of Toronto Press. pp 261-302.

- Italiaander, R. (1961) The New Leaders of Africa. Englewood Cliffs: Prentice Hall.
- Jabavu, N. (1960) Drawn in Colour: African Contrasts. London: John Murray.
- Jabavu, N. (1982) (orig. 1963) The Ochre People. Cape Town: Galvin and Sales.
- Jackson, J.D. (1980) Justice in South Africa. Pelican Books.
- Jallow, B.G. (ed.) (2014) Leadership in Colonial Africa. Disruption of Traditional Frameworks and Patterns. Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jaspan, M.A. (1961) "South Africa 1960-61: The Transition from Passive Resistance to Rebellion." Science and Society, Vol. 25. No. 2 (Spring 1961), pp: 97-106.
- Jaster, R. (1985) "A Regional Security Role for Africa's Frontline States." In Jaster, R. (ed.) (1985) Southern Africa: Regional Security Problems and Prospects. Aldershot: Gower. 37-88.
- Jaster, R.S., Jaster, S.K. (1992) South Africa's Other Whites. Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jeeves, A. H. (1971) "The Problem of South Africa." International Journal. Vol 26, No. 2, 418-32.
- Joffe, J. (2009) The State vs. Nelson Mandela: The Trial that Changed South Africa. Oneworld.
- Johns, S., Hunt Davis, R. Jr. (1991) Mandela, Tambo, and the African National Congress: The Struggle against Apartheid, 1948-1990: A Documentary Survey. Oxford University Press.
- Johns, C.M., Inwood, G.J. (2014) "Theories of Policy Change and a Four-Part Theoretical Framework for Comparative Analysis." In Inwood, G.J., Johns, C.M. (eds.) (2014) Commissions of Inquiry and Policy Change: A Comparative Analysis. University of Toronto Press. pp 20-48.
- Joseph, H. (1968) Tomorrow's Sun: A Smuggled Journal from South Africa. London: Hutchinson.
- Joseph, H. (1998, first published in 1963) If this be Treason: Helen Joseph's Dramatic Account of the Treason Trial, the Longest in South Africa's History and one of the Strangest Trials of the 20th Century. Contra Press.
- Kahn, E. J. (1966) "Constitutional and Administrative Law." Annual Survey of South African Law. 1: 1966.
- Kahn, E. J. (1968) The Seperated People: A Look at Contemporary South Africa. W.W. Norton & Company, Inc. New York.

- Kahn, E. (1982) "Notes and Comments: Retirement of Chief Justice, Mr. Justice F. L. H. Rumpff." 99 S. African L.J. 438 1982.
- Kahn, E. (1997) "Notes and Comments: Retirement of Mr. Justice Michael MacGregor Corbett, Chief Justice of the Republic of South Africa." 114 S. African L.J. 207 1997.
- Kalley, J. (2000) Apartheid in South African Libraries. The Transvaal Experience. The Scarecrow Press, Inc.
- Kane-Berman, J. (1978) Soweto: Black Revolt, White Reaction. Ravan Press.
- Kane-Berman, J. (1991) South Africa's Silent Revolution. South African Institute of Race Relations. Southern Books Publishers.
- Kaplan, H. (2014) "Apartheid on Trial: Mandela's Rivonia Speech from the Dock, Half a Century Later." Social Education. Vol 78, No. 2, 63–67.
- Kaplan, R. (2001) "The Aversion Project – Psychiatric Abuses in the South African Defence Force during the Apartheid Era." SAMJ, March 2001, Vol. 91, No. 3.
- Karis, T. (1961) "The South African Treason Trial." Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 76, No. 2, 217-240.
- Karis, T., Carter, G.M. (eds.) (1977) From Protest to Challenge: A Documentary History of African Politics in South Africa, 1882-1964. 4 vols. Stanford, California: Hoover Institution Press.
- Kasrils, R. (1993) Armed and Dangerous: My Undercover Struggle Against Apartheid. Heinemann.
- Kasrils, R. (2012) The Unlikely Secret Agent. Monthly Review Press.
- Kathrada, A. (2004) Memoirs. Zebra Press.
- Kawasaki, S. (2001) The Policy of Apartheid and the Japanese in the Republic of South Africa. Retrieved from: <http://www.tsukuba-g.ac.jp/library/kiyou/2001/4.KAWASAKI.pdf>
- Keable, K. (ed.) (2012) London Recruits: The Secret War against Apartheid. Merlin Press.
- Keet, B.B. (1956) Whither South Africa? University Publishers and Booksellers.
- Kenney, H. (1980) Architect of Apartheid: HF Verwoerd – An Appraisal. Johannesburg: Jonathan Ball Publishers.
- Kepple-Jones, A. (1963) South Africa: A Short History. London: Hutchinson University Library.
- Khopung, E. (1972) Apartheid: The Story of a Dispossessed People. Dar es Salaam: Sharpeville Day Association Mbizana.

- Klotz, A. (1995) Norms in International Relations: The Struggle against Apartheid. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press.
- Klug, H. (2000) "Law Before and After Apartheid: Abel's Sociolegal Analysis." Law and Social Inquiry. Volume 25, Issue 2, April 2000, Pages 657–667.
- Klug, H. (2010a) The Constitution of South Africa: A Contextual Analysis. Hart Publishing.
- Klug, H. (2010b) Constituting Democracy: Law, Globalism and South Africa's Political Reconstruction. Cambridge University Press.
- Kondlo, K. (2009) In the Twilight of the Revolution. The Pan Africanist Congress of Azania (South Africa) 1959-1994. Basler Afrika Bibliographien.
- Koorts, L. (2014) D.F. Malan and the Rise of Afrikaner Nationalism. Tafelberg.
- Kostal, R. (2005) A Jurisprudence of Power: Victorian Empire and the Rule of Law. Oxford University Press.
- Kros, C. (2002) "W.W. M. Eiselen, Architect of Apartheid Education." In Kallaway, P. (ed.) (2002) The History of Education under Apartheid 1948-1994: The Doors of Learning and Culture Shall be opened. Peter Lang Publishing Inc. 53-73.
- Kruger, D.W. (1969) The Making of a Nation: A History of the Union of South Africa. Johannesburg and London: MacMillan.
- Kuper, L. (1957) Passive Resistance in South Africa. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Kykkotis, S. (2013) Αναφορές στο Νομπελίστα Νέλσον Μαντέλα. Παπασωτηρίου.
- La Guma, A. (1971) Apartheid: A Collection of Writings on South African Racism by South Africans. New York: International Publishers.
- Laidlaw, E.F. (1994) A History of the Isle of Wight Hospitals. Cross Publishing.
- Lambert, R.M. (1993) "Trade Unionism, Class, Race and Nationalism in the 1950s Resistance Movement." In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press, 275-295.
- Lambley, P. (1980) The Psychology of Apartheid. The University of Georgia Press.
- Landis, E.S. (1957) "Apartheid Legislation." Africa Today, Vol. 4, No. 6 (Nov-Dec 1957), pp. 45-48.
- Landis, E. (1961a) "The New Order in South Africa." Africa Today, Vol. 8, No. 8 (October 1961), pp: 4-6.
- Landis, E.S. (1961b) "South African Apartheid Legislation I: Fundamental Structure." The Yale Law Journal. Vol. 71, No. 1. Pp. 1-52.

Landis, E.S. (1962) "South African Apartheid Legislation II: Extension, Enforcement, and Perpetuation." The Yale Law Journal. Vol. 71. No. 3, pp. 437-500.

Langer, E. (1967) "Science in South Africa: The Effects of Apartheid." Science. New Series. Vol. 155. No 3768, 1387-1389.

Lapchick, R.E. (1979) "South Africa: Sport and Apartheid Politics." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 445, 155-165.

Lapierre, D. (2009) A Rainbow in the Night: The Tumultuous Birth of South Africa. Da Capo Press.

Lapping, B. (1986) Apartheid: A History. London: Grafton Books.

Lave, T.R. (1994) "A Nation at Prayer, a Nation in Hate: Apartheid in South Africa." Stanford Journal of International Law, Vol. 30 (Summer 1994), 484-524.

Lawrie, G.G. (1964) "South Africa's World Position." The Journal of Modern African Studies. Volume 2 / Issue 01 / March 1964, pp 41-54.

Lawyers Committee for Human Rights (1986) The War against Children: South Africa's Youngest Victims. Lawyers Committee for Human Rights.

Lazar, J. (1993) "Verwoerd versus the Visionaries. The South African Bureau of Racial Affairs." In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press, 362-393.

Le May, G.H.L. (1995) The Afrikaners: A Historical Interpretation. Oxford: Blackwell Publishers Ltd.

Legassick, M. (1995) "British Hegemony and the Origins of Separation in South Africa, 1901-14." In Beinart, W., Dubow, S. (eds.) (1995) Segregation and Apartheid in Twentieth-Century South Africa. Routledge. 43-59.

Legassick, M., and Saunders, C. (2004) "Above Ground Activities in the 1960s." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2004) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 1 (1960-1970). Zebra Press: 661-84.

Legum, C. (1960) "Crisis in South Africa." World Today, Vol. 16, No. 6, 233-242.

Legum, C. (1963) "The Doomed Republic." Africa Today, Vol. 10, No. 9, 4-7.

Legum, C., Legum, M. (1964a) "Power in South Africa." In Segal, R. (ed.) (1964) Sanctions against South Africa. Penguin Books. 31-41.

Legum, C., Legum, M. (1964b) South Africa: Crisis for the West. London and Dunmow: Pall Mall Press.

Legum, C., Legum, M. (1968) The Bitter Choice: Eight South Africans' Resistance to Tyranny. World Publishing Company.

- Leiss, A. C. (1965) Apartheid and United Nations Collective Measures: An Analysis. New York: The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Lentz, H. M. (1996) Heads of States and Governments since 1945. Routledge.
- Leonard, R. (1983) South Africa at War: White Power and the Crisis in Southern Africa. Westport: Lawrence Hill and Company.
- Levy, B., Hirsch, A., Woolard, I. (2014) South Africa's Evolving Political Settlement in Comparative Perspective. Southern Africa Labour and Development Research Unit. Working Paper Series. Number 138.
- Lewin, H. (1976) Bandiet: Seven Years in a South African Prison. Penguin Books Ltd.
- Lewis, J. (1984) Industrialisation and Trade Union Organisation in South Africa, 1924-55. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lipton, M. (1985) Capitalism and Apartheid: South Africa, 1910-1984. Aldershot: Gower/Maurice Temple Smith.
- Lipton, M. (1987) "Reform: Destruction or Modernization of Apartheid?" In Blumenfeld, J. (ed.) (1987) South Africa in Crisis. Routledge.
- Lichtenstein, A. (2005) "Making Apartheid Work: African Trade Unions and the 1953 Native Labour (Settlement of Disputes) Act In South Africa." The Journal of African History. Vol. 46, No. 2, 293–314.
- Litvak, L., DeGrasse, R., McTigue, K. (1978) South Africa: Foreign Investment and Apartheid. Amsterdam: Institute for Policy Studies.
- Lodge, T. (1983) Black Politics in South Africa since 1945. London and New York: Longman.
- Lodge, T. (2001) "Sharpeville and Memory." Conference Paper Presented at Violence, Memory and Commemoration: Perspectives from Southern, East and Central Africa. Birbeck College, 9 December 2001.
- Lodge, T. (2011) Sharpeville: An Apartheid Massacre and its Consequences. Oxford University Press.
- Longford, C. (1985) South Africa: Black Blood on British Hands. The Revolutionary Communist Party. Junius.
- Loubser, J.A. (1987) The Apartheid Bible: A Critical Review of Racial Rheology in South Africa. Maskew Miller Longman.
- Louw, E.P. (2004) The Rise, Fall and Legacy of Apartheid. Westport: Praeger.

- Louw, E. (2004) On Jewish Immigration and South Africa: A Warning from 1939. Steven Books.
- Loveland, I. (1999) By Due Process of Law? Racial Discrimination and the Right to Vote in South Africa 1855-1960. Hart Publishing.
- Low, V.N. (1958) Education for the Bantu: A South African Dilemma. Comparative Education Review. Vol. 2, No. 2. (Oct. 1958) 21-27.
- Luthuli, A. (1962) Let My People Go. London: Collins.
- Luyt, C. (1989) "The Killing Fields: South Africa's Human Rights Record in Southern Africa." Social Justice: A Journal of Crime, Conflict and World Order; Summer 1989; 16, 2
- Maaba, B. B. (2004) "The PAC's War against the State." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2004) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 1 (1960-1970). Zebra Press: 257-99.
- Macdonald, J.M. (1958) Psychiatry and the Criminal: A Guide to Psychiatric Examinations for the Criminal Courts. Charles C Thomas.
- MacMillan, W.M. (1950) "South Africa Revisited." African Affairs, Vol. 49, No. 197, 319-324.
- Madida, N. (2016) "The Political Imprisonment and Detention of non-South African Citizens under Apartheid 1962-1991." South African History Online. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/abstracts-and-papers-0>
- Mager, A., Minkley, G. (1993) "Reaping the Whirlwind: The East London Riots of 1952." In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press, 229-251.
- Magnien, N. (2012) Dr. Neville Edward Alexander. South African History Online. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/people/dr-neville-edward-alexander>
- Magubane, B. (1996) The Making of a Racist State: British Imperialism and the Union of South Africa, 1875-1910. Trenton and Asmara: Africa World Press.
- Magubane, B. (2000) "Race and Democratization in South Africa," Macalester International: Vol. 9, Article 8. Fall 31-12-2000.
- Magubane, B. (2007) Introduction to the 1970s: The Social and Political Context. In South African Democracy Education Trust (2007) The Road to Democracy in South Africa: 1970-1980, Vol 2. UNISA Press.
- Maharaj, M., Kathrada, A. (eds.) (2006) Mandela: The Authorised Portrait. Kansas City: Andrew McMeel Publishing.
- Maisels, I. (1998) A Life at Law: The Memoirs of I.A. Maisels, QC. Jonathan Bell Publishers Johannesburg.

- Malan, R. (1997) The Essential Steve Biko. David Philip Publishers: Cape Town.
- Malhotra, R. (1964) "Apartheid and the United Nations." Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 354, Africa in Motion, 135-144.
- Mamdani, M. (1996) Citizen and Subject Contemporary Africa and the Legacy of Late Colonialism. Princeton University Press.
- Mandela, N. (1978) The Struggle is My Life. International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.
- Mandela, N. (1984) I am Prepared to Die. International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.
- Mandela, N. (1991) No Easy Walk to Freedom. Johannesburg: Heinemann Publishers
- Mandela, N. (2001) "Clear the Obstacles and Confront the Enemy: Wither the Black Consciousness Movement? An Assessment." In Maharaj, M. (ed.) (2001) Reflections in Prison. Voices from the South African Liberation Struggle. Zebra Press.
- Mandela, N. (2013) (orig. 1994) Long Walk to Freedom. London: Abacus.
- Mantzaris, E. (1984) "The Greek Miners in the Transvaal South Africa: A Socio-Historical Investigation, 1902-1913." Journal of the Hellenic Diaspora. Vol. 11. No. 1. p. 25-37.
- Manzo, K.A. (1996) Creating Boundaries: The Politics of Race and Nation. London and Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Marais, H. (2001) South Africa: Limits to Change: The Political Economy of Transition. University of Cape Town Press.
- Marais, H. (2011) South Africa Pushed to the Limit: The Political Economy of Change. Zed Books.
- Marais, J.A. (1992) Die Era van Verwoerd. Aktuele Publikasies: Pretoria.
- Marais, J.A. (1994) The Founders of the New South Africa. Pretoria: s.n.
- Marks, S. (1983) "Ruth First: A Tribute." Journal of Southern African Studies, Vol. 10, No. 1, Special Issue on Women in Southern Africa (Oct., 1983), pp. 123-128.
- Martin, B. (2007) Justice Ignited: The Dynamics of Backfire. Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield.
- Martin, C. (2013) "Request to Declare Gravesites of H.F. Verwoerd and Dimitri Tsafendas as Historically Heritage Sites." Christian Martin.co.za. Retrieved from: http://www.christianmartin.co.za/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=93:request-to-declare-gravesites-of-hf-verwoerd-and-dimitri-tsafendas-as-historically-heritage-sites&catid=36:articles&Itemid=62

- Marquard, L. (1968) A Short History of South Africa. Praeger Publishers.
- Marquard, L. (1969) The People and Policies of South Africa. London: Oxford University Press.
- Marx, A.W. (1992) Lessons of Struggle: South African Internal Opposition, 1960-1990. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Marx, C. (1994) "The Ossewabrandwag as a Mass Movement, 1939-1941." Journal of Southern African Studies, Vol. 20, No. 2 (Jun., 1994), pp. 195-219.
- Marx, C. (2010) "From Trusteeship to Self-Determination: L.J. du Plessis' Thinking of Apartheid and his Conflict with H.F. Verwoerd." Historia 55, 2, 50-75.
- Marx, C. (2011a) "Hendrik Verwoerd's Long March to Apartheid: Nationalism and Racism in South Africa." In: Berg, M., Wendt, S. (eds.) (2011) Racism in the Modern World: Historical Perspectives on Cultural Transfer and Adaptation. New York: Berghahn Books. 281 – 302.
- Marx, C. (2011b) Oxwagon Sentinel: Radical Afrikaner Nationalism and the History of the Ossewabrandwag. Lit Verlag.
- Marx, C. (2013) "Hendrik Verwoerd and the Leipzig School of Psychology in 1926." Historia 58, 2, 91-118.
- Mathabatha, S. (2004) "The PAC and POQO in Pretoria, 1958-1964." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2004) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 1 (1960-1970). Zebra Press: 299-318.
- Matsinhe, D. M. (2013) Apartheid Vertigo: The Rise in Discrimination against Africans in South Africa. Ashgate Publishing Ltd.
- Matthews, A. S. (1972) Law, Order and Liberty in South Africa. Berkley: University of California Press.
- May, H. J. (1955) The South African Constitution. Cape Town and Johannesburg: Juta and Co.
- May, J. M (1968) Murder by Consent. Hutchinson of London.
- Mbeki, G. (1964) South Africa: The Peasants' Revolt. Penguin Books.
- Mbeki, G. (1991) Learning from Robben Island. The Prison Writings of Govan Mbeki. James Currey: London.
- McConnachie, A.J. (1999) The 1961 Election in the Republic of South Africa. Thesis for Master of Arts at the University of South Africa.

- McDowall Clokie, H., Robinson, J.W. (1969) Royal Commissions of Inquiry: The Significance of Investigations in British Politics. Octagon Books.
- McKay, V. (1966) South African Propaganda. SAIS Review: Spring 1966: 10, 3-17.
- McKay, V. (1966b) South African Propaganda: Methods and Media. Vernon Africa Report: Feb 1, 11, pp. 41-46.
- Mda, T.V. (2000) "Language in Education." In Mda, T.V., Mothata, M.S. (eds.) (2000) Critical Issues in South African Education after 1994. Juta and Company Limited.
- Meierhenrich, J. (2010) The Legacies of Law: Long-Run Consequences of Legal Development in South Africa, 1652-2000. Cambridge University Press.
- Meiring, P. (1999) Chronicle of the Truth Commission: A Journey through the Past and Present into the Future of South Africa. Carpe Diem Books.
- Meli, F. (1988) A History of the ANC: South Africa Belongs to Us. Harare: Zimbabwe Publishing House.
- Meredith, M. (1988) In the Name of Apartheid: South Africa in the Post-war Period. Hamish Hamilton.
- Meredith, M. (2007) Diamonds, Gold and War: The Making of South Africa. Simon and Schuster.
- Michelis, M. (1988) "Δημήτρης Τσαφέντας: Έκανα το Καθήκον Μου ... Εσείς;" ("Dimitris Tsafendas: I did my Duty ... You?") Σχολιαστής (Sholiastis), 70, 24 June 1988.
- Miller, J. (2014) "Voortrekker or State Builder? John Vorster and the Challenges of Leadership in the Apartheid State." In Jallow, Baba (2014) Leadership in Colonial Africa: Disruption of Traditional Frameworks and Patterns. New York: Palgrave MacMillan.
- Miller, J. (2016) An African Volk: The Apartheid Regime and Its Search for Survival. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Miller, R. B. (1993) "Science and Society in the Early Career of H.F. Verwoerd." Journal of Southern African Studies, 19:4, pp. 634-661.
- Minde, M (1977) "History of Mental Health Services in South Africa. Part XIV. Psychiatric Education." SA Mediese Tydskrif. 12 February 1977.
- Minter, W., Hill, S. (2008) "Anti-apartheid Solidarity in United States-South Africa Relations: From the Margins to the Mainstream." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2008) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 3, International Solidarity. UNISA Press. pp. 745-822.
- Mitson, C. (1965) "South Africa's Barbarous Racial Oppression Makes Mississippi as Mild as a Tea Party." Morning Record, January 28, 1965: 6.

Mnguni, M.H. (1998) Education as a Social Institution and Ideological Process. Waxmann.

Mokgatle, N. (1971) The Autobiography of an Unknown South African. London: Hurst and Company.

Moodie, T.D. (1975) The Rise of Afrikanerdom. Berkley: University of California Press.

Moodie, T.D. (2017) "Separate Development as a Failed Project of Social Engineering: The Flawed Logic of Hendrik Verwoerd." South African Historical Journal, 69:2, 153-161.

Morrell, R., Moletsane, R. (2002) "Inequality and Fear; Learning and Working Inside Bantu Education Schools." In Kallaway, P. (ed.) (2002) The History of Education under Apartheid 1948-1994: The Doors of Learning and Culture Shall be opened. Peter Lang Publishing Inc. 224-43.

Morris, J. (1958) South African Winter. London: Faber and Faber.

Morris, M. (1977) "State Intervention and the Agricultural Labour Supply, Post 1948." In Wilson, F., Kooy, A., Hendrie, D. (eds.) (1977) Farm Labour in South Africa. Cape Town: David Phillip Publishers. 62-72.

Morris, M. (2004) Every Step of the Way. The Journey to Freedom in South Africa. HSRC Press.

Motala, S. (1987) Behind Closed Doors. South African Institute of Race Relations.

Mouton, F.A. (2014) "No Prime Minister Could Want a Better Leader of the Opposition: Sir de Villiers Graaff, the United Party and the Apartheid State, 1956-1977." African Historical Review. Vol 46. No. 1. pp. 48-69.

Muller, C.F.K. (ed.) (1981) Five Hundred Years: A History of South Africa. Pretoria: Academia.

Muller, L. (2011) "Tangible and Intangible Ngquza Hill: A Study of Landscape and Memory." In Kepe, T., Ntsebeza, L. (eds.) (2011) Rural Resistance in South Africa. The Mpondo Revolts after Fifty Years. BRILL.

Mungazi, D.A. (2006) The Tragedy of Apartheid in South Africa: Hendrik F. Verwoerd and Dimitri Tsafendas Meet at the Crossroads. Morris Publishing.

Munger, E. S. (1965) Notes on the Formation of South Africa Foreign Policy. Pasadena: Grant Dahlstrom.

Mzimela, S.E. (1980) Nazism and Apartheid: The Role of Christian Churches in Nazi Germany and Apartheid South Africa. PhD thesis. New York University.

Myers, D. (1959) "World News Makers." World Affairs. Vol. 122, no. 1. 23.

Neame, L.E. (1962) The History of Apartheid: The Story of the Colour War in South Africa. London: Pall Mall Press with Barrie and Rockcliff.

- Nelson Mandela Organization (n.d) 1965. Criminal Procedure Amendment Act No 96. Retrieved from: <https://www.nelsonmandela.org/omalley/index.php/site/q/03lv01538/04lv01828/05lv01829/06lv01920.htm>
- Newitt, M. (ed.) (2010) The Portuguese in West Africa, 1415–1670: A Documentary History. Cambridge University Press.
- Nicholas, L.J. (1990) “The Response of South African Professional Psychology Associations to Apartheid.” In Nicholas, L.J., Cooper, S. (1990) Psychology and Apartheid. A Vision/Madiba Publication.
- Nicholas, L.J. (2014) “Psychological Sequelae of Political Imprisonment during Apartheid.” South African Journal of Psychology, 2014, Vol. 44 (1) 18-29.
- Nieftagodien, N. (2014) The Soweto Uprising. Jacana Media.
- Nightingale, E.O., Hannibal, K., Geiger, J., Hartmann, L., Lawrence, R., Spurlock, J. (1990) “Apartheid Medicine: Health and Human Rights in South Africa.” JAMA, October 24/31, 1990-Vol 264, No. 16.
- Nixon, R. (1994) Homelands, Harlem and Hollywood: South African Culture and the World Beyond. Routledge.
- Nixon, R. (1999) “Apollo 11, Apartheid and TV.” The Atlantic. July 1999 Issue. Retrieved from: <http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/1999/07/apollo-11-apartheid-and-tv/377681/>
- Nkabinde, Z.P. (1997) An Analysis of Educational Challenges in the New South Africa. University Press of America.
- Norval, A.J. (1996) Deconstructing Apartheid Discourse. Verso: London, New York.
- Nqakula, C. (2018) The People’s War: Reflections of an ANC Cadre. Real African Publishers.
- Ntantala, P. (1993) A Life’s Mosaic: The Autobiography of Phyllis Ntantala. University of California Press.
- Odendaal, A. (1989) “Resistance, Reform, and Repression in South Africa in the 1980s.” In Hill, I.T., Harris, A. (eds.) (1989) Beyond the Barricades. Popular Resistance in South Africa in the 1980s. Kliptown Books.
- Okoth, A. (2006) A History of Africa: African Nationalism and the De-Colonisation Process. East African Educational Publishers.
- O’Brien, K.A. (2010) The South African Intelligence Services: From Apartheid to Democracy, 1948-2005. Routledge.

O'Meara, D. (1977) "The Afrikaner Broederbond 1927-1948: Class Vanguard of Afrikaner Nationalism." Journal of Southern African Studies, Vol. 3, No. 2, 156-186.

O'Meara, D. (1983) Volkskapitalisme: Class, Capital and Ideology in the Development of Afrikaner Nationalism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

O'Meara, D. (1996) Forty Lost Years: The Apartheid State and the Politics of the National Party 1948-1994. Randburg: Ravan Press.

O'Meara, D. (1997) The Life and Work of Harold Wolpe. Address to the Inaugural Conference of the Harold Wolpe Memorial Trust, 1-2 April 1997.

Orlik, P. (1970) "South Africa: How Long Without TV?" Journal of Broadcasting, Volume 14, Issue 2 (Spring 1970), pp. 245-258.

Osada, M. (2002) Sanctions and Honorary Whites: Diplomatic Policies and Economic Realities in Relations between Japan and South Africa. Praeger.

Owusu, M. (1992) Zan Boko; Mapantsula. City & Society, 1992, 6(2): 176-181.

Pallister, D., Stewart, S., Lepper, I. (1988) South Africa Inc. The Oppenheimer Empire. Corgi Books.

Pampallis, J. (1991) Foundations of the New South Africa. London: Zed Books Ltd.

Parker, P., Parker-Mokhesi, J. (1998) In the Shadow of Sharpeville: Apartheid and Criminal Justice. Macmillan Press Ltd.

Paton, A. (1965) South African Tragedy: The Life and Times of Jan Hofmeyr. Oxford University Press.

Paton, A. (1966) "Dr. Heinrich Verwoerd: A Liberal Assessment." Liberal Opinion. December 1966.

Paton, A. (1973) Apartheid and the Archbishop: The Life and Times of Geoffrey Clayton, Archbishop of Cape Town. David Philip Publishers.

Peires, J. (2004) The Holocaust and Apartheid: Similarities and Differences A Comparative Study. A dissertation submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the award of the degree of Master of Arts in Jewish Studies. Faculty of the Humanities, University of Cape Town.

Pelzer, A.N. (ed.) (1966) Verwoerd Speaks: Speeches 1948-66. Johannesburg: APB Publishers.

Pelzer, A.N. (1979) Die Afrikaner-Broederbond: Eerste 50 Jaar. Tafelberg-Uitgewers Beperk.

Pfister, R. (2005) Apartheid South Africa and African States: From Pariah to Middle Power, 1961-1994. London and New York: Tauris Academic Studies.

Pienaar, H. (1999) "Hendrik Verwoerd." In Human & Rousseau (1999) They Shaped our Century: The Most Influential South Africans of the Twentieth Century. Human & Rousseau.

Pienaar, S., Sampson, A. (1960) South Africa: Two Views of Separate Development. Oxford University Press.

Pierce, J. (1999) "World: Africa Democratic Party Return from the Wilderness." BBC News, June 3, 1999. Retrieved from: <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/world/africa/360189.stm>

Pike, H.R. (1985) A History of Communism in South Africa. Christian Mission International of South Africa.

Pillay, V. (1963) Verwoerd's Military Preparations. The Cairo Office of the African National Congress.

Pirie, G.H., Rogerson, C.M., Beaven C.S.O. (1980) "Covert Power in South Africa: The Geography of the Afrikaner Broederbond." Area, Vol. 12, No. 2 (1980), pp. 97-104.

Pirie, G.H. (1992) Rolling Segregation into Apartheid: South African Railways, 1948-53. Journal of Contemporary History, Vol. 27, No. 4, (Oct., 1992), pp. 671-693.

Pogrand, B. (1990) How Can Man Die Better ... Sobukwe and Apartheid. Peter Halban. London.

Pogrand, B. (2000) War of Words: Memoir of a South African Journalist. Seven Stories Press.

Pohlandt-McCormick, H. (2000) "I Saw a Nightmare...: Violence and the Construction of Memory (Soweto, June 16, 1976)." History and Theory, Vol. 39, No. 4, Theme Issue 39: "Not Telling": Secrecy, Lies, and History (Dec., 2000), pp. 23-44.

Pollack, R. (1981) Up Against Apartheid. The Role and the Plight of Press in South Africa. Southern Illinois University Press.

Pos, M. (1967) Wie Was Dr. Verwoerd. N.V. Uitgeverij. De Banier- Utrecht.

Posel, D. (1987) "The Language of Domination, 1978-1983." In Marks, S., Trapido, S. (eds.) (1987) The Politics of Race, Class and Nationalism in Twentieth Century South Africa. London and New York: Longman. 419-443.

Posel, D. (1993) "Influx Control and Labour Markets in the 1950s." In Bonner, P., Delius, P., Posel, D. (eds.) (1993) Apartheid's Genesis: 1935-62. Raven Press, 411-430.

Posel, D. (1997) The Making of Apartheid 1948-1961. Clarendon Paperbacks.

Posel, D. (2009) "The Assassination of Hendrik Verwoerd: The Spectre of Apartheid's Corpse." African Studies. Volume 68, Issue 3. Pp: 331-350.

Posel, D. (2011) "The Apartheid Project, 1948-1970." In Ross, R., Mager, A. K., Nason, B. (eds.) (2011) The Cambridge History of South Africa. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Pretorius, P.J. (1997) $ Sell-Out. The Truth Behind the History of South African Politics. Published by the Author.

Price, R. (1984) Pretoria's Southern African Strategy. African Affairs, Vol. 83, No. 330 (Jan., 1984), pp. 11-32

Prinsloo, D. (1981a) "Dr. H. F. Verwoerd as Hoofredakteur van Die Transvaler." Kleio, 13:1-2, 5-19.

Prinsloo, D. (1981b) "Dr. H. F. Verwoerd en die Ossewa-Brandwag 1938-1952." Kleio, 17:1, 73-85.

Rabkin, D. (1975) Drum Magazine and the Works of Black South African Writers Associated with it. Doctoral Thesis. University of Leeds.

Rademeyer, C. (2014) "Entrenching Apartheid in South African Sport, 1948-1980." Journal for Contemporary History. Vol. 39. No. 2. 119-137.

Randal, P., Desai, Y. (1967) From "Coolie Location" to Group Area. A Brief Account of Johannesburg's Indian Community. Johannesburg: South African Institute of Race Relations.

Rappaport, H. (2001) Encyclopaedia of Women Social Reformers. ABC-CLIO Ltd.

Rayner, M. (1987) Turning a Blind Eye? Medical Accountability and the Prevention of Torture in South Africa. Washington: AAAS Committee on Scientific Freedom and Responsibility.

Rayner M. (1990) "From Biko to Wendy Orr: The Problem of Medical Accountability in Contexts of Political Violence and Torture. In Manganyi N.C., du Toit A. (eds.) Political Violence and the Struggle in South Africa. Palgrave Macmillan, London.

Reddy, E.S. (1974) "Apartheid and the International Community." A Journal of Opinion, Vol. 4, No. 3 (Autumn, 1974), pp. 19-24.

Reddy, E.S. (1991) India and the Struggle against Apartheid. London: Hansib Publishing.

Reed, D. (1974) The Siege of Southern Africa. Macmillan South Africa.

Rees, P. (1990) Who's Who in the Extreme Right since 1890: An International Biographical Dictionary. Prentice-Hall.

Reeves, A. (1955) Justice in South Africa. London: The Africa Bureau.

Reeves, A. (1960) Shooting at Sharpeville: The Agony of South Africa. London: Victor Gollancz Ltd.

- Reeves, A. (1962a) South Africa: Let the Facts Speak. London: Christian Action.
- Reeves, A. (1962b) South Africa—Yesterday and Tomorrow: A Challenge to Christians. London: Victor Gollanz Ltd.
- Republic of South Africa. (June 15 1961) Debates of the Senate, col. 5342.
- Rhoodie, N.J. (1969) Apartheid and Racial Partnership in Southern Africa. Academica.
- Rich, P.B. (1989) "Doctrines of 'Change' in South Africa." In Brewer, J.D. (ed.) (1989) Can South Africa Survive? Five Minutes to Midnight. Macmillan Press.
- Robertson, I., Whitten, P. (eds.) (1978) Race and Politics in South Africa. New Brunswick: Transaction Books.
- Robinson, J. (1996) The Power of Apartheid: State, Power and Space in South African Cities. Oxford: Butterworth Heinemann.
- Rogers, B. (1972) The "Bantu Homelands." An International Defence and Aid Fund Pamphlet. Christian Action Publishers Ltd.
- Rogers, B. (1976) Divide and Rule: South Africa's Bantustans. London: International Defence and Aid Fund.
- Rogers, B., Bolton, B. (1981) Sanctions against South Africa: Exploding the Myths. Manchester Free Press and Holland Committee on Southern Africa.
- Rose, B.T. (1965) "Bantu Education as a Facet of South African Policy." Comparative Education Review. Vol 9. No. 2. 1965. 208-212.
- Rosenhaft, E. (2009) Beating the Fascists? The German Communists and Political Violence 1929-1933. Cambridge University Press.
- Rosenthal, E. (1966) Southern African Dictionary of National Biography. Frederick Warne and Co. Ltd.
- Rosenthal, E. (1978) Encyclopaedia of Southern Africa. Cape Town and Johannesburg: Juta and Company Limited.
- Roskam, K. L. (1960) Apartheid and Discrimination. Leyden: AW Stythoff.
- Rotberg, R. I. (1983) "The Process of Decision Making in Contemporary South Africa." In Kitchen, H. (ed.) (1988) South Africa: In Transition to What? The Centre for Strategic and International Studies: Washington, D.C.
- Roux, E. (1972) Time Longer than Rope: A History of the Black Man's Struggle for Freedom in South Africa. The University of Wisconsin Press.
- Rubin, L. (1961) This is Apartheid. London. Victor Gollancz LTD.

Rubin, L. (1975) Apartheid in Practice (Study prepared by Rubin at the request of the United Nations Unit on Apartheid). United Nations Publication.

Rubin, L., Rubin, N. (1965) This is Apartheid. A Christian Action Pamphlet.

Rudolph, H. (1984) Security, Terrorism and Torture: Detainees' Rights in South Africa and Israel: A Comparative Study. Cape Town: Juta and Co Ltd.

Rydon, J. (1958) "The South African General Elections." The Australian Quarterly, Vol. 30, No. 2 (June, 1958), pp. 30-38.

Sachs, A. (1968) Stephanie on Trial. Harvill Press, London.

Sachs, A. (1970) The Violence of Apartheid. An International Defence and Aid Pamphlet. London: Christian Action Publications.

Sachs, A. (1973) Justice in South Africa. Sussex University Press.

Sachs, A. (2011) The Soft Vengeance of a Freedom Fighter. Souvenir Press Ltd.

Sachs, B. (1961) The Road from Sharpeville. London: Brian Dobson.

Sachs, E.S. (1952) The Choice Before South Africa. London: Turnstile Press.

Sachs, E.S. (1965) The Anatomy of Apartheid. Collet's.

Sanders, J. (1999) South Africa and the International Media, 1972-1979: A Struggle for Representation. Routledge.

Sanders, J. (2006) Apartheid's Friends: The Rise and Fall of South Africa's Secret Service. John Murray.

Sarakinski, I. (1992) "South Africa: Changing Politics and the Politics of Change." In Benjamin, L., Gregory, C. (eds.) (1992) Southern Africa at the Crossroads? Prospects for Stability and Development in the 1990s. Justified Press.

Scheepers Strydom, C.J. (1967) Black And White Africans: A Factual Account of South Africa Race Policies in the Verwoerd Era. Tefelberg-Uitgewers. Cape Town.

Schadeberg, J. (1987) The Fifties People of South Africa. Black Life: Politics-Jazz-Sport. A Bailey's African Photo Archives Production.

Schadeberg, J. (ed.) (1990) Nelson Mandela and the Rise of the ANC. Bloomsbury Publishing Limited.

Schalkwyk, J. (2001) "Chronotopes of the Self in the Writings of Women Political Prisoners in South Africa." Yousaf, N. (ed.) (2001) Apartheid Narratives. BRILL. pp. 1-36.

Schifter, R. (1993) "Human Rights at the United Nations: The South Africa Precedent." American University International Law Review. Vol. 8, No. 2, 361-72.

- Schmidt, E. (1980) Decoding Corporate Camouflage. U.S. Business Support for Apartheid. Institute for Policy Studies.
- Schoeman, B.M. (1975) Die Sluipmoord op Dr. Verwoerd. Strydpers Bpk. Pretoria.
- Schoeman, B.M. (1980) Die Geldmag. SA se Onsigbare Regering. Pretoria: Aktuele Publikasies.
- Scholtz, J.J.J. (1967) Die Moord op Dr. Verwoerd. Nasionale Boekhandel BPK.
- Scholtz, J.J.J. (1974) Dr. Hendrik Frensch Verwoerd. Perskor-uitgewery.
- Schonteich, M., Boshoff, H. (2003) Volk, Faith and Fatherland: The Security Threat Posed by the White Right. Institute for Security Studies.
- Schlemmer, L. (1970) Social Change and Political Policy in South Africa. South African Institute of Race Relations.
- Seegers, A. (1996) The Military in the Making of Modern South Africa. London: Tauris Academic Publishers.
- Seekings, J. and Natrass, N. (2005) Class, Race, and Inequality in South Africa. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.
- Seeley, J. (1984) "South Africa's Foreign Policy System, 1910-1966." In Geldenhuys, D. (1984) The Diplomacy of Isolation: South African Foreign Policy Making. The South African Institute of Foreign Affairs. Johannesburg: MacMillan. 1-29.
- Segal, L., Cort, S. (2012) One Law, One Nation: The Making of the South African Constitution. Jacana Media.
- Segal, R. (1960) The Agony of Apartheid. A Christian Action Pamphlet.
- Segal, R. (1961) Political South Africa: A Who's Who. London: Stevens and Sons Ltd.
- Segal, R. (ed.) (1964) Sanctions Against South Africa. Penguin Books.
- Seiler, J. (1975) "South African Perspectives and Responses to External Pressures." The Journal of Modern African Studies. Vol 13, 447-68.
- Serfontein, J.H.P. (1978) Brotherhood of Power: An Expose of the Secret Afrikaner Broederbond. Indiana University Press.
- Shain, M. (1994) The Roots of Antisemitism in South Africa. University of Virginia Press.
- Shain, M. (2008) "Reviewed Work: Community and Conscience: The Jews in Apartheid South Africa by Gideon Simoni." The Jewish Quarterly Review, Vol. 98, No. 1 (winter, 2008), pp. 147-150.

- Shaw, G. (1999) The Cape Times: An Informal History. Cape Town: David Phillip Publishers.
- Shaw, G. (2007) Believe in Miracles: South Africa from Malan to Mandela – and the Mbeki Era. Newlands: Ampersand Press.
- Shimoni, G. (1980) Jews and Zionism: The South African Experience. Cape Town: Oxford University Press
- Shimoni, G. (2003) Community and Conscience: The Jews in Apartheid South Africa. The Tauber Institute for the Study of European Jewry Series. Hanover, N.H.: University Press of New England [for] Brandeis University Press: Cape Town: David Philip Publishers.
- Shirer, W.L. (1964) The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich. London: Pan.
- Sidley, P. (1995) "South Africa's Doctors Apologise for Apartheid Years." British Medical Journal, Vol. 311, No. 6998 (Jul. 15, 1995), p. 148.
- Sidley, P. (1997) "South African Truth Commission Calls Doctors to Account for Their Actions during the Apartheid Era." British Medical Journal, Vol. 314, No. 7098 (Jun. 28, 1997), p. 1850.
- Sifakis, C. (2013) Encyclopaedia of Assassinations. Skyhorse Publishing.
- Silove, D. (1990) "Doctors and the State: Lessons from the Biko Case." Social Science & Medicine. Volume 30, Issue 4, 1990, Pages 417-429.
- Simons, J., Simons, R. (1983) Class and Colour in South Africa, 1850-1950. International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.
- Simson, H. (1980) The Social Origins of Afrikaner Fascism and its Apartheid Policy. Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell International.
- Sisulu, E. (2003) Walter & Albertina Sisulu: In Our Time. Abacus.
- Sisulu, W. (1990) "Foreword." In Schadeberg, J. (ed.) (1990) Nelson Mandela and the Rise of the ANC. Bloomsbury Publishing Limited.
- Sisulu, W., Houser, G.M., and Shore, H. (2001) I Will Go Singing: Walter Sisulu Speaks of his Life and the Struggle for Freedom in South Africa. Robben Island Museum in Association with The Africa Fund, New York.
- Sitze, A. (2013) The Impossible Machine: A Genealogy of South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. University of Michigan Press.
- Shore, L. (1990) "The Cultural Boycott of South Africa (II)." In Edgar, R.E. (ed.) (1990) Sanctioning Apartheid. Africa World Press, Inc.
- Smeulders, A., Grundfeld, F. (2012) International Crimes and Other Gross Human Rights Violations: A Multi- and Interdisciplinary Textbook. Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.

Smith, D. M. (ed.) (1982) Living Under Apartheid: Aspects of Urbanization and Social Change. London: George Allen and Unwin.

Smith, H. L. (1979) Anatomy of Apartheid. Khanya Publishers.

South African Department of Information (1978) Amnesty for Terrorism. South African Department of Information.

South African Institute of Race Relations (1962) A Survey of Race Relations in South Africa 1961. South African Institute of Race Relations.

South African Institute of Race Relations (1964) A Survey of Race Relations in South Africa 1963. South African Institute of Race Relations.

South African Institute of Race Relations (1966) A Survey of Race Relations in South Africa 1965. South African Institute of Race Relations.

South African Institute of Race Relations (1972) A Survey of Race Relations in South Africa 1971. South African Institute of Race Relations.

Solani, N., Nieftagodien, N. (2004) "Political Imprisonment and Resistance in South Africa: The Case of Robben Island, 1960-1970." In South African Democracy Education Trust (2004) The Road to Democracy in South Africa, Volume 1 (1960-1970). Zebra Press: 391-411.

Soudien, C. (2002) "Teachers' Responses to the Introduction of Apartheid Education." In Kallaway, P. (ed.) (2002) The History of Education under Apartheid 1948-1994: The Doors of Learning and Culture Shall be Opened. Peter Lang Publishing Inc. 211-223.

South Africa: House of Assembly (1961) Debates. January 23-27, 1961, col. 98.

South Africa: House of Assembly (1971) Debates. 21 April 1971.

Southern Africa the Imprisoned Society (SATIS) (1985) Political Trials in South Africa: Judicial Instruments of Repression. SATIS.

South African History Online (n.d.) James Barry Munnik Hertzog. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/people/james-barry-munnik-hertzog>.

South African History Online (n.d.) Johannes G. Strijdom. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/people/johannes-g-strijdom>

South African History Online (n.d.) Pan Africanist Congress Timeline 1959-2011. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/topic/pan-africanist-congress-timeline-1959-2011>

South African History Online (n.d.) Robert Sobukwe Inaugural Speech, April 1959. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/archive/robert-sobukwe-inaugural-speech-april-1959>

South African History Online (n.d.) Rowley Israel Arenstein. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/people/rowley-israel-arenstein>

South African History Online (n.d.) Sir Sydney Kentridge. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/people/sir-sydney-kentridge>

South African History Online (n.d.) The Inquest into Biko's Death and his Funeral. Retrieved from: <http://www.sahistory.org.za/article/inquest-bikos-death-and-his-funeral>

South African Law Journal (1995) In Memoriam: Israel Aaron Maisels QC. 112 S. African L.J. 132 1995.

Sowden, L. (1968) The Land of Afternoon: The Story of a White South African. London: Elek Books Limited.

Sparks, A. (1990) The Mind of South Africa. Heinemann.

Sparks, A. (1995) Tomorrow is Another Country. The Inside Story of South Africa's Road to Change. The University of Chicago Press.

Spence, J. E. (1966) After Verwoerd. World Today; Oct 1, 1966; 22, 10.

St. John, R. (1954) Through Malan's Africa. Victor Gollancz Ltd.

Stevens, R. (1971) "Zionism, South Africa and Apartheid: The Paradoxical Triangle." Phylon Vol. 32, No. 2, pp. 123-142.

Stephenson, J. (1978) Jonathan Stephenson on a Cape Town Incident. Fortnight, No. 159 (Dec., 1977 - Jan., 1978), p. 27.

Stoler, A.L. (2009) Along the Archival Grain Epistemic Anxieties and Colonial Common Sense. Princeton University Press.

Strauss, S.A. (1996) "The Person with Schizophrenia and Criminal Justice: Some Aspects." The Comparative and International Law Journal of Southern Africa, Vol. 29, No. 3 (November 1996), pp. 282-294.

Strangwayes-Booth, J. (1976) A Cricket in the Thorn Tree: Helen Suzman and the Progressive Party of South Africa. Indiana University Press.

Study Commission on U.S. Policy toward Southern Africa. (1981) South Africa: Time Running Out - The Report of the Study Commission on U.S. Policy toward Southern Africa. University of California Press.

Stultz, N. M. (1969) "The Politics of Security: South Africa under Verwoerd, 1961-6." The Journal of Modern African Studies, 7, 1 (1969), pp. 3-20.

Stultz, N. M. (1974) Afrikaner Politics in South Africa, 1934-48. University of California Press.

Stultz, N. M. (2016) "Evolution of the United Nations Anti-Apartheid Regime." In Young, T. (ed.) (2016) Readings in the International Relations of Africa. Indiana University Press.

Stultz, N.M., Butler, J. (1963) "The South African General Election of 1961." Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 78, No. 1, Mar, 1963, pp. 86-110.

Sulitzeanu-Kenan, R. (2010) "Reflection in the Shadow of Blame: When Do Politicians Appoint Commissions of Inquiry?" British Journal of Political Science, Vol. 40, No. 2. Pp. 613-634.

Suttner, I. (ed.) (1997) Cutting through the Mountain: Interviews with South African Jewish Activists. Viking Penguin: New York.

Suttner, R. (2001) Inside Apartheid's Prison. Ocean Press.

Suzman, H. (1993) In No Uncertain Terms - A South African Memoir. Alfred A Knopf.

Suzman, H. (1997) "Helen Suzman interview" in Suttner, I. (ed.) (1997) Cutting through the Mountain: Interviews with South African Jewish Activists. Viking Penguin: New York.

Swanepoel, P.C. (2007) Really Inside BOSS: A Tale of South Africa's Late Intelligence Service (and Something about the CIA). Published by the Author.

Switzer, L. (1997) "Socialism and the Resistance Movement: The Life and Times of the Guardian, 1937-1952." In Switzer, L. (ed.) (1997) South Africa's Alternative Press: Voices of Protest and Resistance, 1880s-1960s. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Tafira, H.K. (2017) Xenophobia in South Africa: A History. Palgrave Macmillan.

Tambo, O. (1964) "Apartheid: The Indictment." In Segal, R. (ed.) (1964) Sanctions against South Africa. Penguin Books. 15-30.

Tatz, C.M. (1961) "Apartheid: Battle for the Mind." The Australian Quarterly, Vol. 33, No. 2. 18-29.

Tatz, C.M. (1962) Shadow and Substance in South Africa. University of Natal Press.

Temkin, B. (2003) Buthlezi: A Biography. Frank Cass and Co. Ltd: London.

Terreblanche, S. (2002) A History of Inequality in South Africa 1652-2002. Pietermaritzburg: Interpak Books.

The Bishop of Johannesburg (1960) Report on South Africa. Christian Action.

The Round Table: The Commonwealth Journal of International Affairs. (1958) "South Africa. Dr. Verwoerd's Government." The Round Table: The Commonwealth Journal of International Affairs, 49: 193, 87-90.

Thompson, D. V. (1957) "The South Africa of Today." African Affairs, Vol. 56, No. 223 (Apr., 1957), pp. 128-136.

Thompson, L. (1966) The Republic of South Africa. Boston: Little, Brown and Company.

Thompson, L. (2001) A History of South Africa. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.

Thurlow, R. (1984) "Anti-Nazi Antisemite: The Case of Douglas Reed." Patterns of Prejudice, Vol. 18, 1984, Issue. 1, pp. 23-34.

Tower Hamlets International Solidarity. (1985) Pulling out from Apartheid: A Guide to Action. Tower Hamlets International Solidarity.

Transition (1961) "David Pratt is Dead." In Transition 75/76. The Anniversary Issue. Selections from Transition, 1961-1976. pp. 270-272.

Transition (1964) Torture in South Africa. Extracts from the Report of the UN Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa. A/5825, No. 19, 8 December 1964.

Transition (1965) Torture in South Africa. Allegations of Ill-Treatment and Torture of Prisoners. No. 19. 17-22.

Transition (1976) Torture in South Africa. No. 50 (Oct., 1975 - Mar., 1976) 52-57.

Troup, F. (1975) South Africa: An Historical Introduction. Harmondsworth: Penguin Books.

Troup, F. (1976) Forbidden Pastures: Education under Apartheid. London: International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa.

Truth and Reconciliation Commission (1998) Truth and Reconciliation Commission of South Africa Report, Volume Two.

Truth and Reconciliation Commission. (1998) Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Volume Three.

Truth and Reconciliation Commission. (1998) Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Volume Four.

Turk, A.T. (1982) Political Criminality: The Defiance and Defence of Authority. Beverly Hills: SAGE Publications, Inc.

Tyler, H. (1995) Life in the Time of Sharpeville and Wayward Seeds of a New South Africa. Kwela Books.

Tyler, H., Furie, B.G. (1960) "Security Council Resolution and Patrick Duncan. Sharpeville and After." Africa Today, Vol. 7, No. 3 (May, 1960), pp. 5-8.

UNESCO (1972) Apartheid: Its Effects on Science, Culture and Information. The UNESCO Press.

UNESCO (1974) Racism and Apartheid in Southern Africa. South Africa and Namibia. The UNESCO Press.

United Nations Centre against Apartheid., N'dumbe, A. Kum'a. (1976) Relations between Nazi Germany and South Africa. United Nations, New York.

United Nations Office of Public Information (1969) Action Against Apartheid. United Nations. New York.

University of KwaZulu-Natal (n.d) Liberal Party of South Africa (LPSA). Alan Paton Centre and Struggle Archives. Retrieved from: <http://paton.ukzn.ac.za/Collections/liberal.aspx>

Uys, S. (1959) "Dr. Hendrik Frensch Verwoerd, Prime Minister of South Africa," Africa South, Jan-March 1959, 1-12.

Uys, S. (1965) Opium of the Afrikaner. Transition, No. 19 (1965), pp. 13-16.

Uys, S. (1989) "The Afrikaner Establishment". In Johnson, Shaun (ed.) South Africa: No Turning Back. Bloomington and Indianapolis: Indiana University Press. 206-240.

Vale, P. (1987) "Regional Policy: The Compulsion to Incorporate." In Blumenfeld, J. (ed.) (1987) South Africa in Crisis. Routledge.

van Aarde, A. G., de Villiers, P. G. R., Buitendag, J. (2014) The Forgotten Struggle of Albert Geyser Against Racism and Apartheid. Article served as introduction to the very first A.S. Geyser Commemoration Lecture held on 17 February 2014 at the Faculty of Theology of the University of Pretoria.

van der Bergh, H. J. (1967) "Sabotage in South Africa." In National Council to Combat Communism (1967) Battle for the Mind: Papers Read at the International Symposium on Communism, Sept. 1966, Pretoria. Joubert Park.

van den Berghe, P. L. (1962) "Apartheid, Fascism and the Golden Age." Cahiers d'Études Africaines, Vol. 2, Cahier 8, pp. 598-608.

van den Berghe, P. L. (1966) "Racial Segregation in South Africa: Degrees and Kinds." Cahiers d'Études Africaines, Vol. 6, Cahier 23, 408-419.

van den Berghe, P. L. (1967) South Africa: A Study in Conflict. University of California Press.

van der Horst, S. T. (1981) "Employment." In Van der Horst, S.T., Reid, J. (eds.) (1981) Race Discrimination in South Africa: A Review. David Philip Publisher, Cape Town.

van der Walt, J. L. (2015) "Perspectives on Teacher Education: A Comparison of Religious Education in Estonia and South Africa." In Karras, K.G., Calogiannakis, P., Wolhuter, C.C.

and Kontogianni, D. (eds.) (2015) Education and Teacher Education in the Modern World. Cambridge Scholars Publishing. 199-210.

van der Westhuizen, C. (2007) White Power and the Rise and Fall of the National Party. Cape Town: Zebra Press.

van Jaarsveld, F.A. (1977) "The Afrikaner's Idea of his Calling and Mission in South African History." Journal of Theology for Southern Africa, Vol. 19, June 1977.

van Rooyen, J.H., Goldberg, F.J., Morris. N. (1976) "The Psychopath in South African Criminal and Mental Health Law." The Comparative and International Law Journal of Southern Africa. Vol. 9, No. 1 (March 1976), pp. 1-56.

van Tonder, R. (1990) Boerestaat. Boerestaat Party Randburg.

van Woerden, H. (2000) A Mouthful of Glass. Granta Books. London.

Vassen, R. (n.d.) "Detentions without Trial during the Apartheid Era." South Africa: Overcoming Apartheid, Building Democracy. Available at:
<http://overcomingapartheid.msu.edu/sidebar.php?id=65-258-9&page=1>

Vatcher, W. H. (1965) White Laager: The Rise of Afrikaner Nationalism. London: Pall Mall Press.

Venter, J. J. (1999) "H. F. Verwoerd: Foundational Aspects of his Thought." Koers, 64 (4), 1999: 415-442.

Verwey, E. J. (ed.) (1995) New Dictionary of South African Biography, v.1. HSRC Press.

Verwoerd, H. F. (1961a) The Truth about South Africa. Government brochure.

Verwoerd, H. F. (1961b) Live and Let Live. Fact Paper 91-April 1961. Dagbreek.

Verwoerd, H. F. (1963) Dr. H. F. Verwoerd on I: Crisis in World Conscience. II: The Road to Freedom for Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland. Government brochure.

Verwoerd, W. J. (2001) Verwoerd: Só Onthou ons Hom. Protea Boekhuis.

Vigne, R. (1969) The Transkei – A South African Tragedy. The Africa Bureau.

Vigne, R. (1997) Liberals against Apartheid: A History of the Liberal Party in South Africa. Houndsmills and New York: Palgrave.

Visser, G.C. (1976) OB: Traitors or Patriots? MacMillan South Africa.

Visser, N. (1997) "Postcoloniality of a Special Type: Theory and Its Appropriations in South Africa." The Yearbook of English Studies. Vol. 27, The Politics of Postcolonial Criticism (1997), pp. 79-94.

Vontress, C. E., Naiker, K. S. (1995) "Counselling in South Africa: Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow." Journal of Multicultural Counselling and Development, Vol 23, Issue 3 (July 1995), pp. 149-157.

Waldmeir, P. (1997) Anatomy of a Miracle. The End of Apartheid and the Birth of a New South Africa. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.

Walker, M. (1990) "History and History Teaching in Apartheid South Africa." Radical History Review (1990) 1990(46-47): 298-308.

Walsh, P. (1967) RCMP Security and Intelligence Against Communism in Canada. Canadian Anti-Communist Secretariat.

Walsh, P. (1970) The Rise of African Nationalism in South Africa: The African National Congress, 1912-1952. London: C. Hurst and Company.

Walshe, A.P. (1963) "The Changing Content of Apartheid Author." The Review of Politics, Vol. 25, No. 3, pp. 343-361.

Ward, J. J. (1984) "Terror, Revolution, or Control? The KPD's Secret Apparatus During the Weimar Republic." Terrorism, Volume 7, Issue 3, 1984, 257-297.

The Water Wheel (2011) "Kouga Dam – Serving the Fertile Gamtoos Valley." The Water Wheel January/February 2011, p. 20-24.

Warwick, R. (2009) White South Africa and Defence 1960-1968: Militarization, Threat Perceptions and Counter Strategies. PhD Thesis, University of Cape Town.

Welsh, F. (2000) A History of South Africa. Great Britain: Harper Collins.

Wentzel, J. (1995) The Liberal Sideaway. South African Institute of Race Relations.

Weyl, N. (1970) Traitor's End. The Rise and Fall of the Communist Movement in Southern Africa. Arlington House.

Wheeler, J. H. (1961) "Apartheid Implemented by Education in South Africa." The Journal of Negro Education. Vol. 30. No. 3, pp. 241-250.

Wheeler, D. L. (1983) "In the Service of Order: The Portuguese Political Police and the British, German and Spanish Intelligence, 1932-1945." Journal of Contemporary History, Vol. 18, No. 1 (Jan., 1983), pp. 1-25.

Wiechers, M (1968) "South West Africa: The Decision of 16 July 1966 and its Aftermath." The Comparative and International Law Journal of Southern Africa, Vol. 1, No. 3 (November 1968), pp. 408-446.

Wieder, A. (2013) Ruth First and Joe Slovo in the War Against Apartheid. Monthly Review Press.

Williams, D. K. (2013) "Sex and the Evangelicals; Gender Issues, the Sexual Revolution, and Abortion in the 1960s." In Schafer, A.R. American Evangelicals and the 1960s. University of Wisconsin Press, 97-118.

Wilkins, I., Strydom, H. (1979) Broederbond: The Super-Afrikaners. London: Corgi Books.

Willems, C., West, N., Unwon, R., Eveleigh, S. (1988) A Case for Change. Rights, Repression and Responses in South Africa. Leeds Education Development Centre.

Wills, I. (2012) "The Politics of Bantu Education in South Africa: 1948-1994." Political Crossroads. Vol. 19, No. 1, 2012, pp. 5-24.

Wilson, L. (1991) "Steve Biko: A Life." In Pityana, N.B. Ramphela, M., Mpumlwana, M.,

Wilson, L. (1991) Bounds of Possibility: The Legacy of Steve Biko and Black Consciousness. David Philip Publishers.

Wilson, M., Thompson, L. (1969) The Oxford History of South Africa. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Winter, G. (1981) Inside BOSS: South Africa's Secret Police. Penguin Books Ltd.

Witz, L. (2003) Apartheid's Festival: Contesting South Africa's National Past. Indiana University Press.

Wolfe, B. D. (2001) Three who made a Revolution: A Biographical History of Lenin, Trotsky and Stalin. Cooper Square Publishers Inc.

Wolpe, H. (1995) "Capitalism and Cheap Labour Power in South Africa: From Segregation to Apartheid." In Beinart, W., Dubow, S. (eds.) (1995) Segregation and Apartheid in Twentieth-Century South Africa. Routledge. 60-90.

Wood, J. R. T. (1987) "The Roles of Diefenbaker, Macmillan and Verwoerd in the Withdrawal of South Africa from the Commonwealth." Journal of Contemporary African Studies, 6:1-2, 152-179.

Wood, J.R.T. (2012) A Matter of Weeks Rather Than Months: The Impasse between Harold Wilson and Ian Smith Sanctions, Aborted Settlements and War 1965-1969. Trafford.

Wood, R.J., Haines, R., Lloyd, H.R. (2014) "Afrikaans Business under Apartheid: The Case of the Western Cape." Mediterranean Journal of Social Sciences. Vol 5, No 27, December 2014.

Woods, D. (1978) Biko. Paddington Press Ltd.

Woods, D. (1987) South African Dispatches. Penguin Books.

Worden, N. (2000) The Making of Modern South Africa. Blackwell. Third edition.

Worger, W. H., Clark, N. L., Alpers, E. A. (2010) Africa and the West: A Documentary History. Volume 2: From Colonialism to Independence, 1975 to the Present. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

World Peace Council (1972) Apartheid is Built on Torture. Helsinki: Information Centre of the World Peace Council.

Worrall, D. (1971) "Politics and Parties." In Worrall, D. (ed.) (1971) South Africa: Government and Politics. Pretoria: JL van Schaik, 172-253.

Worsnip, M. E. (1991) Between Two Fires: The Anglican Church and Apartheid, 1948-1957. Pietermaritzburg: University of Natal Press.

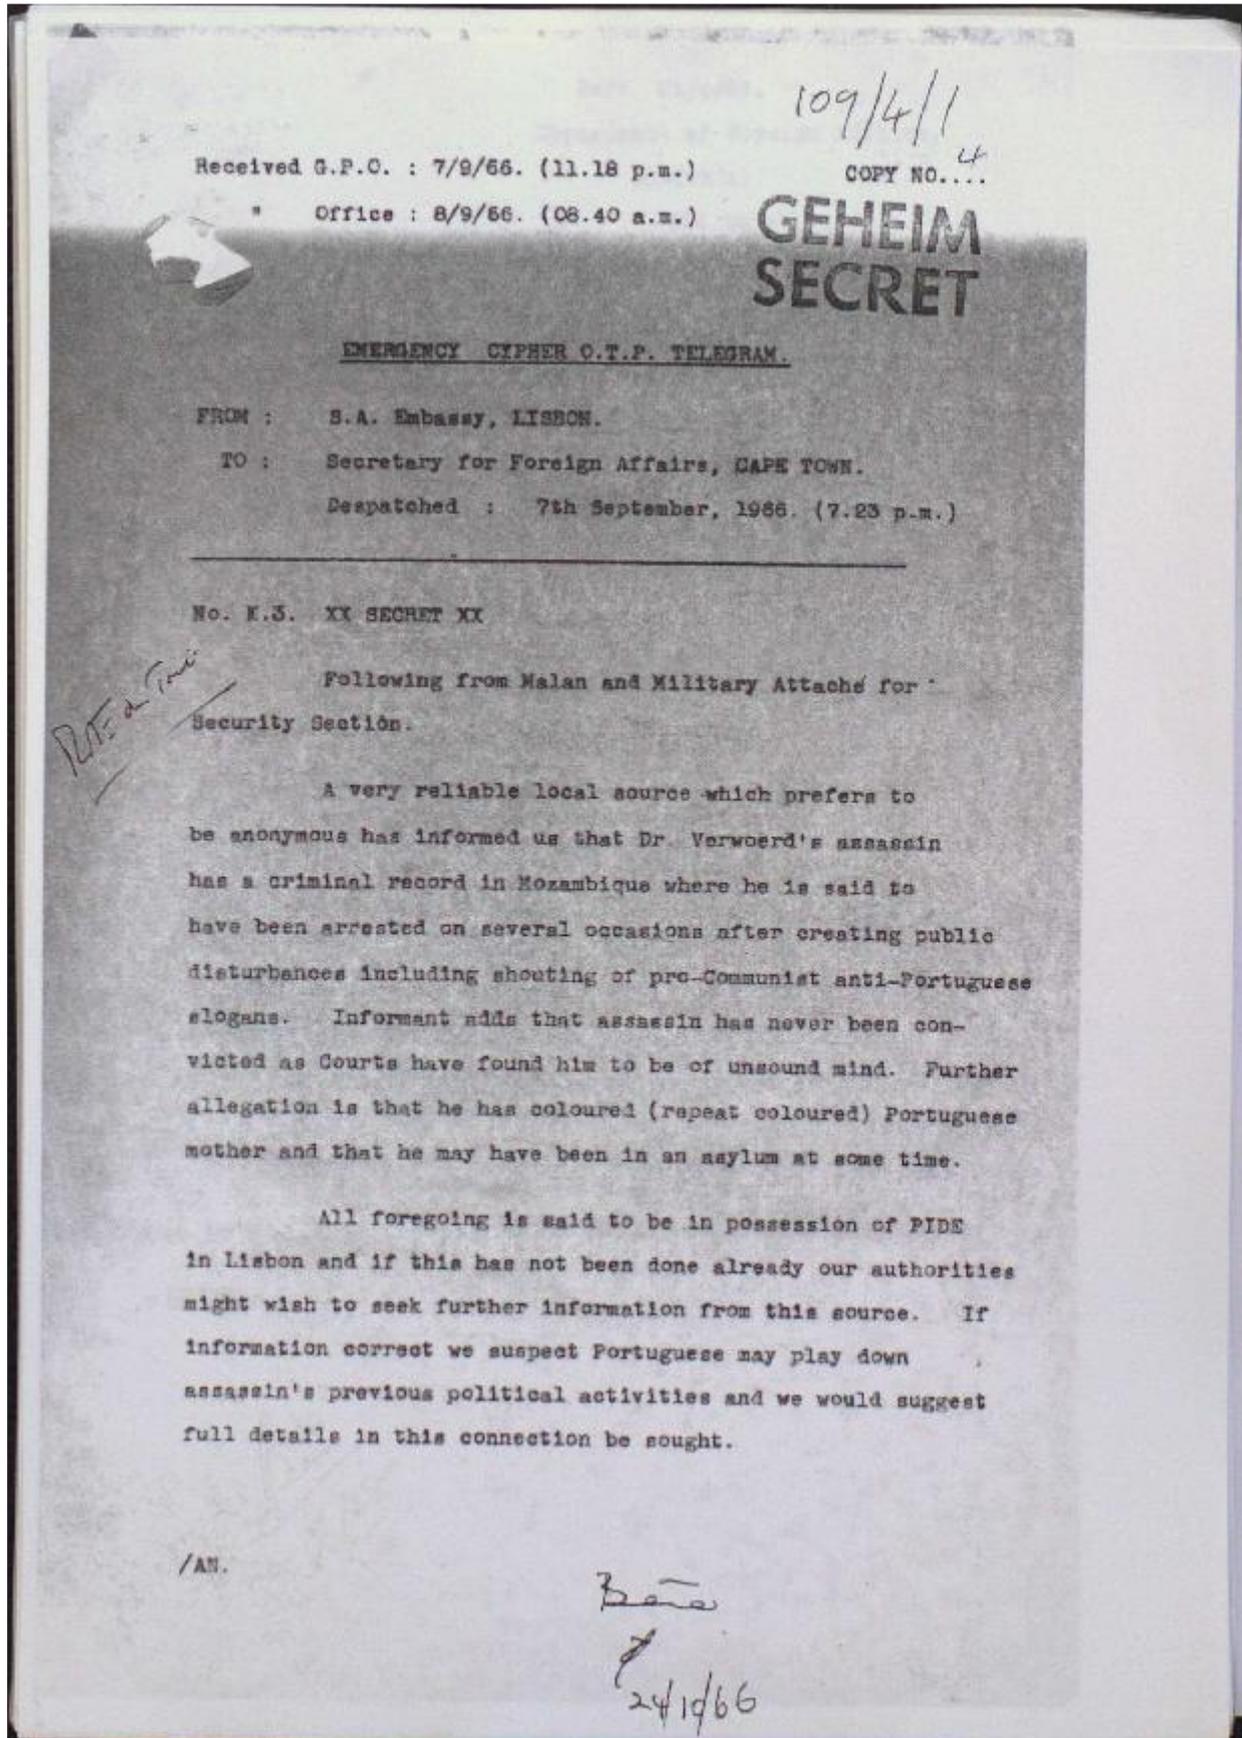

Wylie, N. (2011) "The Shock of the New: Ngquza Hill 1960." In Kepe, T., Ntsebeza, L. (eds.) (2011) Rural Resistance in South Africa. The Mpondo Revolts after Fifty Years. BRILL.

Wyman, D.S., Rosenzweig, S. H. (1996) The World Reacts to the Holocaust. Johns Hopkins University Press.

Zug, J. (2007) The Guardian: The History of South Africa's Extraordinary Anti-Apartheid Newspaper. Pretoria: UNISA Press.

APPENDIX

I: Memorandum of the South African Embassy in Lisbon, Portugal.

Appendix

II: PIDE's Chief Inspector in Lisbon instructing the agency's Sub-Director in Mozambique that "information indicating Tsafendas as a partisan for the independence of your country should not be transmitted to the South African authorities, despite the relations that exist between your delegation and the South African Police."

Appendix

III: The first item on PIDE's file on Tsafendas opened in 1938. Tsafendas being "suspected of distributing communist propaganda."

124

POLÍCIA DE VIGILANCIA E DEFESA DO ESTADO SECÇÃO POLÍTICA E SOCIAL

CADASTRO SECRETO N.º 10.415

--	--

Nome Demitrios Tsafantakis e Grego

Alcunha _____ Estado _____ Profissão Empregado de escri torio

Data do nascimento _____ Naturalidade _____

Filiação _____

Residência Quelimane

Sinais particulares _____

BIOGRÆFIA

Esteve empregado em Quelimane na Imperial Airways.- Suspeito de destri buir propaganda comunista.- Consta que foi para o Transvaal.

